Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman has just stated, if I understood him correctly, that this was a unanimous report from the Committee on Banking and Currency. I would like to clarify that and say that I was not present when the bill was reported out. If I had been present I would have voted against it.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I am glad to be corrected, because I have no desire to misrepresent anybody.

If my bill had been enacted into law in 1926, the number of bank failures would have been reduced to a minimum and millions of dollars would have thus been saved to the depositors. If the Steagall bill, which proposes to assess the banks for the purpose of creating the guaranty fund, had been in effect, it would mean that these 7,246 banks of the United States would have had to bear the loss to depositors in all insolvent banks since 1926, which in all probability would have put 50 per cent of them out of business.

Under section 201a of the Steagall bill the guaranty fund is made up as follows: There is to be paid into the fund (1) by the Government, the franchise tax heretofore paid to the United States, 1914–1930, inclusive, $147,126,882; (2) by Federal reserve banks, out of the surplus now in the hands of the 12 Federal reserve banks, each bank to pay an amount which bears the same ratio to the said $150,000,000 as its surplus bears to total surplus of the 12 banks on December 31, 1931, $150,000,000; (3) by member banks, a total not to exceed, unless a less amount is fixed by the board, $200,000,000.

The number of nonmember banks, by States, as of December 31, 1931, is as follows:

[Figures for a few States are as of the nearest call date prior to December 31, 1931, no call having been made as of December 31 by the banking departments of such States.]

[1] Excluding private banks not under State supervision.

In many sections of the country stock in banks can not be sold to anybody at any price, and in many States in the Union banks decline to loan money to anyone. So we have the situation confronting us where the banks are afraid to loan money and are not loaning it to meet the demands of the people, and the depositors are afraid to leave their money with the banks. The public is demanding, and justly so, that some law be enacted, sound in principle and not burdensome, which will insure depositors they will get their deposits when called for. And yet no administration since the World War has made any effort to make this result effective. President Harding's administration did not undertake to do so. The administrations of President Coolidge did not, and the administration of President Hoover has not submitted any plan to do so. To my certain knowledge, the Treasury Department under the administrations of Presidents Coolidge and Hoover were opposed to any legislation guaranteeing protection to depositors in banks. The Secretary of the Treasury, the Comptroller of the Currency, the governor and every member of the Federal Reserve Board under both of these administrations were opposed to such legislation, and they are now opposed to the Steagall bill. Failure of Congress to pass a guaranty deposit bill and Wall Street manipulations and activities under the last two administrations and Wall Street's baneful influence with the capitals of the world, including this country, are two of the major causes of the unprecedented and destructive panic which has shocked the world.

I can not support the Steagall bill:

(a) Because the small banks, especially in the agricultural sections have earned but little money, if any, during the last two or three years, and the large banks for some reason or other are not functioning properly. They are not loaning money as they should. This complaint is general from one end of the country to the other, and to pass legislation of this character would give them another reason for refusing to make loans.

(b) Because taxing National banks and State banks, members of the Federal reserve system, to create the guaranty fund is unsound, inequitable, and unjust. The Steagall bill fixes the maximum fund of $200,000,000 and requires member banks to contribute an amount which bears the same ratio to this fund as its average deposits bear to average deposits of all member banks. The total deposits as of December 31, 1931, were $30,746,386,000, the percentage of which is 0.00325. Upon this basis the assessment for the first year on member banks of the system is as follows:

$400,000	1,300

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has again expired.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia 10 additional minutes.

Mr. ALMON. Have the hearings on this bill been printed?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Oh, yes.

In the year 1931 there was not a single national bank failure in Vermont, Maine, Rhode Island, and Connecticut. The total deposits of 160 national banks doing business in those States was $444,971,000, as reported in September, 1931; yet under the Steagall bill those banks which have enjoyed such a record for safety would be compelled to pay an amount equal to $1,334,913 for the privilege of taking care of little banks in the South and West and East, wherever they fail. It is an outrageous proposition it seems to me. If you are going to have a guaranty fund, take it from the Treasury of the United States, where you go to get funds for everything recommended by the President and all the leaders of the House and the leaders in the Senate, including the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN], who is so keenly and intensely interested in the bonus bill. Take it out of the Treasury. [Applause.]

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. GARBER. I have a high regard for the gentleman's legal ability. Is it the gentleman's opinion that the bill could not be amended so as to bring into the guaranty provision all of the nonmember banks?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. It can be provided for, but the banks can not come in unless they are in such financial condition as to meet the approval of the Treasury Department. Besides, some of them do not want to come in.

Mr. REILLY. Let them stay out.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. They are staying out.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I shall be pleased to.

Mr. COX. In other words, if this bill goes into effect every weak State bank in the country that can not qualify must close.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. That is my contention.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Why should they not close if they can not qualify?

Mr. COX. Simply because they can not compete as against national banks subsidized by the National Government, as is provided in the proposed bill.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield for the gentlemen to carry on a colloquy.

I can not get much excited about a bill which would force nonmember banks into the Federal reserve system against their will because the charges Mr. STEAGALL referred to could not be collected by the banks after they became members of the system. Besides, member banks do not get interest on the reserve fund banks are required to maintain.

(c) Because this bill takes away from the Federal reserve system over half of the net earnings of the system as of April 6, 1932, which was $259,421,000. The surplus of each Federal reserve bank is as follows:

Boston	$20,039,000
New York	75,077,000
Philadelphia	26,486,000
Cleveland	27,640,000
Richmond	11,483,000
Atlanta	10,449,000
Chicago	38,411,000
St. Louis	10,025,000
Minneapolis	6,356,000
Kansas City	8,124,000
Dallas	7,624,000
San Francisco	17,707,000
Total	259,421,000

If this amount of money is to be taken from the earnings of the Federal reserve system, I would suggest that the same be returned to the member banks of the system who paid and caused this accumulation of earnings.

As a matter of information, I am including in this address the gross and net earnings and expenses of all Federal reserve banks and also of each Federal reserve bank from 1914 to 1930, inclusive.

(d) Because the pending bill would drive the nonmember banks into the Federal reserve system against their will if qualified, or put them out of business. Congress ought not to pass any law which would force the nonmember banks into the Federal reserve system against their will. Even if these nonmember banks, in order to get the guaranty protection, are willing to become members of the Federal reserve system, many of them in all probability would have serious difficulty in complying with the requirements of the office of the Comptroller of the Currency and the Federal Reserve Board.

Should a nonmember bank's application to become a member of the Federal reserve system be turned down and if this information should become public, a run on this bank would be inevitable, ending in closing its doors.

If these nonmember banks should apply for and succeed in meeting the requirements of the Treasury Department, thereby becoming members of the Federal reserve system, they are required under the provisions of this bill to be assessed or taxed double the amount placed on State banks already members of the system. Many of the State banks not members of the Federal reserve system can not afford or can not qualify to become members of the system on account of the requirements of the system, which would mean the closing of many of the State banks not members of the Federal reserve system, and all of the State banks with capital of less than $25,000 would have to close their doors since no person would deposit money except in a guaranty bank.

(e) Because all the State banks not members of the Federal reserve system with a capital of $25,000 and less are ineligible to obtain the benefits of the guaranty fund proposed in this bill.

(f) Because this bill discriminates against member banks. Section 202 (d) provides if the guaranty fund is found more than adequate the board may refund to each Federal reserve bank and to each national bank an amount which bears the same ratio to the excess as the amount which each such bank contributed, whereas there is no provision for a refund to State member banks.

After all is said and done upon this proposition it is very simple. It requires the good banks to take care of the bad banks, the strong banks to take care of the weak banks, the solvent banks to take care of the insolvent banks, and that burden would be put upon 7,246 banks. This bill furnishes no protection whatever to small banks with less than $25,000 capital. It gives only a conditional protection to all nonmember banks having capital of over $25,000 throughout the entire country.

We should frame some sane and sound guaranty law, reasonable and equitable in its enforcement, and get the funds out of the pockets of Uncle Sam without taxing the banks which are now in more or less trouble and making no money. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. Will my colleague permit me to call attention to another inequality carried by the bill against the State banks? It relieves stockholders in national banks organized from a day subsequent to the adoption of the bill of the double liability clause.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. COX. This means a reorganization of all existing banks in order that stockholders may be relieved of the double liability clause. And in that connection permit me to further state that most of the States have this same provision in their State banking laws.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I can not touch upon all the objections I have against this bill. I have honestly given you my objections to this bill from my point of view.

Mr. STEAGALL's heart is all right, but his thinking is wrong about this thing. There are 7,256 banks which will have to carry the tax and they do not want to do it.

The American Bankers Association has declared against it. The Georgia Bankers Association has declared against it. The Country Bankers Association of Georgia has declared against it. I think I owe it to my State, to the member banks of the Federal reserve system, as well as the banks who are not members of the Federal reserve system to go on record against the proposition of taxing any bank anywhere in the United States to create this guaranty fund, and I place my objections on record with pleasure. [Applause.]

I am heartily in favor of a sound and safe deposit fund law, and that such a law should be enacted for the protection of depositors, but the money necessary for the purpose of creating a guaranty fund should be appropriated out of the Federal Treasury, but in no case should a tax be levied on member banks for this purpose.

Mr. Chairman, I have some statistics here I did not read in their entirety. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and therein include the same.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 20 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, this bill is a leap into a chasm of uncertainty. It is unsound in principle and should not be enacted into law. It undoubtedly comes about at this time because of a situation which exists in this country, due largely to the disorganization of finance and economics caused by the depression which started in 1929, resulting in many bank failures, due to losses and depreciation in values throughout the country.

It is a subsidy on the part of the Government of the United States, the same kind of a subsidy, only more definite, than that which was granted when a franchise was given by the United States to the Federal reserve system.

I want to point out in the first instance what the franchise is that was granted to the Federal reserve system by the United States Government. It is the franchise of note issue, which at this time amounts, in round figures, to $2,700,000,000. The United States is now to be deprived of any earnings from that source. The Federal reserve banks have the use of that $2,700,000,000 in Federal reserve note issue. They place it in their assets and they have the benefit of the earnings that accrue from investment of this cash. In addition to that the United States pays the Federal reserve system for certain fiscal operations. The banks of the United States which are members of the Federal reserve system also contribute a fund to the operation of the Federal reserve system in that they contribute something over $2,100,000,000 in deposits, for which the member banks receive no income in the way of interest, which the Federal reserve system loans at the usual rate and has the benefit of whatever income they may receive from that source. These member banks also contribute the entire capital stock and there is also contributed for the use of the system the surplus funds which have been accumulated from the earnings of the Federal reserve system, which surplus, in case of liquidation, belongs to the United States Government. It is a nice franchise which the United States Government is giving to the Federal reserve system, and embodied in that is the control of the issuance of money and credit. No other franchise of equal importance was ever granted by the United States Government to any organization of any kind. This power to control the money and credit is the power to control prices.

At this particular session of Congress there have been enacted several pieces of legislation which have to do with the Federal reserve system, not the least of which is the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, a creation by the United States Government, with a capital of $500,000,000, which is authorized to issue $1,500,000,000 of debentures to be sold. To whom? Under the operation of the plan, with the large requirements of the United States Government for refunding operations and to make up deficits other than that provided in the tax bill, the Governnment of the United States has got to borrow large sums of money. If I read the situation correctly, the Treasury of the United States is not going to permit the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to go into the market and bid against the needs and requirements of the Public Treasury. You gentlemen will recall, I am sure, that there is a provision in that law to the effect that the Treasury can purchase these Reconstruction Finance Corporation obligations. I am simply mentioning that to show that the United States Government gives away a franchise to issue money and credit to the Federal reserve system. I also call attention to the fact that when the United States Government wants money it has to pay that system for the money, and that is particularly true if, under the Steagall-Glass bill, it is necessary for the system to inflate in order to take care of the requirements of the Government and meet the demands of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Here in this bill we have a further franchise of that same character. It has been tried out in several of the States, and I want to point out the fact that in each one of these States it has failed. It is a class of risk that the surety companies and insurance companies of the United States are not willing to carry; in fact, at this time the surety companies which have been carrying on the surety business for special deposits of States and local political subdivisions on funds which belong to schools, towns, or cities are withdrawing entirely from that field, and for some time past, before they retired entirely from it, these surety companies were requiring the banks to put up an equal amount of good securities to cover that risk. The surety companies have been charging one-half of 1 per cent, and they have been losing money on that operation. Now they are refusing to guarantee these deposits in banks——

I say this is a Government subsidy. It is a Government subsidy, and I will show you how and why. The bill provides that the guaranty fund shall be made up how? First, by the Government. The franchise tax heretofore paid to the United States, from 1914 to 1930, inclusive, $147,000,000. That means that the money comes directly out of the Public Treasury and it must come out of taxes or borrowings. It will increase the Treasury deficit; it will unsettle conditions and to that extent further unbalance the Budget that we are hearing so much about these days. The Federal reserve banks are to contribute $150,000,000. From what fund? From the surplus fund, which belongs to the United States Government and not to the banks. So there is practically $300,000,000 of this guaranty fund that is contributed by the United States Treasury. There is no one here who will argue for a moment that that is not an assumption of the guaranty fund by the United States Government. Of course it is. The Government will be called on for that fund, just as we are being called upon at this session to take care of Government-organized institutions, organized with Government money, and which in the first instance it was argued would make no further demands upon the Public Treasury. But they are making further demands, and, as to this guaranty fund, certainly no one can claim for one moment that this is not the establishment of a guaranty of bank deposits by the Government of the United States. The Government is to appropriate directly one hundred and forty-seven million and odd and furnish $150,000,000 from Federal reserve surplus which belongs to the United States.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Is there any difference between the word "guaranty" and the word "insurance" in connection with these bank deposits?

Mr. McFADDEN. I am using the expression that has been used here generally.

Now, the establishment of this fund is not going to stop bank failures. If anything, it will encourage, through irresponsible management, more bank failures. One of the finest things about sound banking to-day is sound management. This is going to permit promoters and schemers to buy up banks and to use them because the deposits will be insured.

I was told last summer in New York by some of the men engaged in the investment-banking business, some of the men who have been largely responsible for the exploitation of the banks and have caused to a large extent many failures of banks and individuals by unloading improper securities on the innocent country bankers and others, many of the securities being foreign securities, that we were going to pass a guaranty of deposits bill at this session of Congress. I said, "What is the idea? I do not believe there is sentiment for such an unsound proposition." They replied, "I will tell you why you are going to do it.

"These investment bankers who have been engaged in the sale of foreign securities in the United States and who have been engaged in various combinations of domestic institutions where they have pyramided assets and sold at par or better in a willing market securities that were not worth 10 cents on the dollar, as has been proven by the market statistics of to-day, are afraid to meet the great number of depositors of failed banks, because they are responsible for having invested the deposits belonging to depositors in these phony securities, and therefore they are insisting that the United States Government step in and guarantee deposits to the great mob of depositors throughout the country, fearing that if the situation develops into a greater disaster these depositors, knowing now who is largely responsible for the exploitation of their sacred deposits, will en masse cause a disturbance, and fix responsibilities on these so-called investment bankers, some of whom are the so-called international group."

Do you want to pass legislation for purposes of that kind, to guarantee the losses and mistakes of these bankers? If so, pass this bill.

I am opposed to this bill for these reasons. It will encourage reckless and unsound banking. There is no guaranty that the plan will be successful and will not break down as it has in all States where it has been tried. It will place an undue burden on the banks, which many will be unable to meet. It discriminates against State nonmember banks. It does away with double liability on stock, which I feel is very essential. Let me say something here. The chairman of the committee has referred to double liability as nonproductive. Let me touch upon one phase of the situation which this particular clause will greatly facilitate, and that is the question of chain banking and holding-company banking, and in this connection I want to mention briefly the irresponsible stockholders of bank stocks in this country.

Many people own bank stocks to-day in the names of dummies to escape all responsibility. This not only applies to banking but applies to many of our large industries and railroads. You will find by looking over the stockholders' list of our large corporations that the managing officers or the control hold comparatively few shares in the institutions which they are managing, and this is particularly true at the present time. This was brought to my attention a few weeks ago by reference to the small amount of stock held by the individual directors of the United States Steel Corporation. According to the press many of them hold only 10 shares of stock.

This provision will remove an obstacle from holding companies organized for the purpose of controlling bank stocks, because one of the impediments there is this undisclosed stockholders' liability or this double liability. I think it is a particularly dangerous thing on that account and will tend to accelerate holding-company buying and holding stocks in banks.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield for a question in that particular?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then the statement made by the gentleman of the actual practice rather confirms the position that double liability is not a real asset to the depositors of failed banks?

Mr. McFADDEN. I say it will accelerate ownership by holding companies which engage in chain and group banking, because they are deprived now from doing this to a certain extent by the fact there is an undisclosed, double liability.

Mr. STAFFORD. My impression, so far as banks in my home city are concerned, is that they do not resort to that practice and that the stock is held by the real owners and not by dummy ownership.

Mr. McFADDEN. During the last few years it has been most unfortunate that speculation has been engaged in in bank stocks to such a large extent. Certainly, it has changed the whole situation so far as ownership of banks is concerned and put many of them in the category of speculative stocks.

Sound, conservative management is the keystone of success of any business, whether it be banking, lumber, or groceries; and while I realize that economic conditions have been in a large measure responsible for our recent wave of bank failures, I also know that we have 20,000 going banks and that many banks which have failed would not had they been properly managed.

It has not been unusual for a bank on one corner to close while its conservatively managed neighbor bank on the opposite corner survived and is still doing business. What this bill proposes is to say, in effect, to the well-managed bank, You have a competitor who is weak, is badly managed, which may fail, and we are going to penalize you, your depositors and stockholders to pay for the bad management of this other institution. With what result? Obviously, the answer—Why should I strive to run a good bank; why not take chances and risks as does the other bank if I am to be penalized?

If you are in the grocery business, the law business, or newspaper business, why should you who run a well-managed, successful institution be penalized to pay for the mistakes of others in the same line of business, and that is what we try to do here, except it is the banking business.

I am not a banker; but common sense indicates that if this bill becomes law it will do more than anything else to promote reckless banking. No plan of insurance or guaranty, either applied to bank deposits or to any form of credit or property is sound or can long be successfully maintained where a uniform premium is assessed upon all participants, strong or weak, good or bad, alike.

Let us see what the experience of the States has been with respect to the guaranty of deposits. All the laws on this subject in the States have either been repealed or are inoperative. In other words, such plans have failed. Page 34 of the hearing before the subcommittee shows the following:

Oklahoma: Enacted in 1907 panic, inoperative in 1921, due to fund being practically insolvent, repealed March 31, 1923, deficit between $7,000,000 and $8,000,000.

Kansas: Enacted in 1909, a voluntary system, not requiring payment in full, balance assessed after full liquidation, repealed 1929, deficit $7,000,000, inoperative since 1926.

Texas: Enacted in February, 1925; made optional bond security system, guaranteeing system; became practically inoperative in that year; repealed 1927; deficit $16,000,000.

Nebraska: Enacted 1911; repealed March 3, 1930; deficit $20,000,000.

Mississippi: Enacted 1914; suspended March 11, 1930, due to deficit of $3,000,000 to $4,000,000.

South Dakota: Enacted in 1915, repealed in 1925 by legislature, reinstated by moratorium in 1926, finally repealed in 1927, deficit $32,000,000.

North Dakota: Enacted in 1915, repealed in 1929, deficit $14,000,000.

Washington: Enacted in 1917; voluntarily canceled when Scandinavian Bank in Seattle failed with deposits of $9,000,000, and then all of banks in system withdrew warrants issued and not paid; inoperative since 1921.

Mr. ADKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. ADKINS. In those States, one of them in particular, where the deposits were guaranteed, the newspapers gave out a statement at one time that they had a bank for every 780 people.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Could the gentleman tell us what was the amount paid into that fund in the various States?

Mr. McFADDEN. I have not those data here. If I can get them, I shall put them into the RECORD.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Can the gentleman tell us how the average amount paid in compares with the amount called for under this bill?

Mr. McFADDEN. I shall be glad to put that into the RECORD also.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed 20 minutes.

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield myself 10 minutes more.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Is it not true in many States where the system has failed that the only money the depositors have gotten has been from appropriations made by the legislatures of those States to satisfy the wants of these depositors?

Mr. McFADDEN. To quite an extent.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I am sorry, but I want to finish this statement if I may, because I think it is important.

Now that is the history of the State guaranty of deposits. There is not one of them operating; every one has become hopelessly insolvent. The chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee will tell you, as he has told you before, that this has nothing to do with his bill; that the experience of an individual State does not prove that this bill will not work. That line of argument is not convincing to me; the same principle is involved, and the record of these eight great States can not be ignored.

This bill will not stop bank failures; it is designed to pay the depositor in full when a bank fails. Now let us see what the history of bank failures will show as to losses. There are no figures available as to State banks where the largest percentage of failures has occurred, but we have some figures to go on in national banks.

We have been told that $45,000,000 has been the total losses to depositors in national banks during the history of national banks down to 1925. There has been some misunderstanding on this figure. Upon inquiry at the office of the Comptroller of the Currency I find that $45,000,000 was the loss on the closed banks which had been completely liquidated, but there were closed banks still in the process of liquidation at that time.

In 1930, 898 national banks had been fully liquidated with losses of $95,231,473, and 443 were in process of liquidation. If we add these 443 banks and 571 which failed from 1930 to February this year and use the same percentage of loss, we find that the total estimated losses would be $409,957,170 for the national system alone. If we add the failures in the State member system from 1921 to February of this year, of 383 banks—losses, $278,400,000—we have a grand total of $688,357,170 of losses in the Federal reserve member banks alone. No consideration has been given in these figures to State banks which do not belong to the Federal reserve system. The bill contemplates these banks will take advantage of the plan. It is among the nonmember State banks that the greater number of failures have occurred. From the Federal reserve bulletins and reports I find that during the last 11 years—1921 to 1931—7,578 nonmember State banks with deposits of $2,695,034,000 failed. If we follow the same percentage as to losses in these banks as the national system, we find they amount to $853,786,771. Adding this figure to $688,357,170, we have a grand total of losses of $1,542,143,941.

Thus in a 10 or 11 year period we find the losses in our banking system to be well over a billion and a half dollars. These are the losses, but this bill will pay the depositor in full. The total deposits in the failed banks of this country the last 11 years—1921 to 1931—according to Federal Reserve Board figures were $4,345,872,000. If the bill proposed had been in operation, it would not only have been inadequate but sunk beyond recall. We all hope history will not repeat, but it has a strange way of doing so, and if the past repeats, the provisions of this bill will not operate, for during that 11-year period, working at a maximum, it would have taken $100,000,000 a year from the banks as a levy, or $1,100,000,000, and with its capital funds of $297,126,882, or a total of $1,397,126,882, it could not by any stretch of the imagination, including collections from assets, have paid out over $4,000,000,000.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. WOODRUFF. The gentleman speaks of the losses that have occurred from the failure of banks during the past two years to call attention to the stupendous losses occasioned the depositors by the failure of those banks. Is it not his opinion that many of the banks that have failed during that time would be open and doing business to-day had it not been for the fear in the minds of the depositors that those banks were unsound and that it was this which caused them to withdraw their funds?

Mr. McFADDEN. That undoubtedly is so. It is fear and sometimes facts that cause runs on banks. I am sorry that I can not yield further to the gentleman.

I have said that the bill will place an undue burden on the banks and that it discriminates against nonmember banks. The bill will take $100,000,000 a year from the member banks, or on the basis of the total deposits in the member banks as of December 31, 1931, the sum of $3,200 for each $1,000,000 of deposits.

I would like to point out in addition to this withdrawal of this $150,000,000 of the Government's money which is now a part of the surplus of the Federal reserve system, that you are going to withdraw a fund that otherwise would belong to the Government to the extent probably of $100,000,000 a year, or whatever may be required to pay depositors of failed banks.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I know the gentleman does not want to make the statement that there is the slightest dream on the part of anybody that the Federal reserve banks will ever again pay $100,000,000 under existing law into the Treasury.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman tell us how much will be withdrawn annually?

Mr. STEAGALL. No; but they have ceased to pay any at all, and the most they ever paid during the war was $50,000,000.

Mr. McFADDEN. But let me call attention to the fact that there is an undisclosed liability there that if it is needed to pay depositors in failed banks the Federal reserve will have to pay its share of $100,000,000 a year. I hope it will not be needed.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Out of its own money.

Mr. McFADDEN. Out of its surplus earnings, which surplus, when created, belongs to the United States Government in case of liquidation.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will not the gentleman yield to pursue my question a little further.

Mr. McFADDEN. If I had the time, but I am depriving other gentlemen of their allotted time.

I find from testimony before the subcommittee, page 37, that during the 5-year period, 1926 to 1930, 15.8 per cent, or nearly 16 per cent, of the national banks lost money; that is, not only did they carry no earnings to undivided profits, paid no dividends, but operated at a loss. In banks with loans and discounts between $150,000 and $250,000, 28 per cent lost money; between $250,000 and $500,000, 20 per cent lost money; between $500,000 and $750,000, 14 per cent lost money, and so on up the list. I have no reason to believe that State banks have any better record. Yet it is upon these banks you place the burden of responding to an assessment each year, and if they can not meet it, either one of two things happens—the plan fails or the successful bank stands the burden. In the abnormal year of 1931 the member banks—see page 56 of the hearings—after losses, made but $13,499,000. Yet this bill, if it had been in operation, would have taken $100,000,000. It is in an abnormal year we have the most bank failures.

As to nonmember State banks, we find that they will be permitted to receive the benefits of the bill provided they are in sound financial condition and contribute to the fund twice the amount levied on the member banks, or $6,400 for each $1,000,000 of deposits. If this bill is a burden on the member banks, it is doubly one on the nonmember banks and these banks are the greater bulk of our banks. On December 31, 1931, there were 7,246 member banks of the Federal reserve system as compared with about 14,000 nonmember banks. In other words, twice the number will bear a double burden. It is clearly a discrimination.

I turn now to the provision of the bill relieving the stockholders of national banks from the double liability on their stock in the event of failure or impairment of capital of the bank. I judge that the argument will be made that inasmuch as we will have a guaranty of deposits law, it will not be necessary to have double assessment to protect the depositors. It must be remembered, however, that the fund would have to be replenished and the recoveries from stockholders would be a material help since approximately 50 per cent of these assessments are collected and experience has shown that 16 per cent of the dividends paid in national banks come from the proceeds of stock assessments.

Moreover the double liability plays a very important part in the going bank, especially when the capital structure becomes undermined through losses and the capital is impaired but the bank is not insolvent. It gives a vehicle by which the Comptroller of the Currency is able to in many cases have the bank's capital restored and saves the institution.

In conclusion I desire to point out that this bill will take from the Public Treasury $147,126,882. I anticipate that the statement will be made that this amount was paid into the Federal Treasury by the Federal reserve banks through earnings made from member banks and that there is no reason why it should not now be withdrawn. As a matter of fact, while it was paid into the Federal Treasury, it has been used and as such is not there now. To now get this amount will mean that it either has to be raised through taxation or borrowed, and at a time when we are attempting to economize and balance the Budget it will add one more burden.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman has just quoted the comptroller and has set forth banks that have lost money and how much they lost. Does the gentleman agree with the comptroller as to what the remedy is—not that we make banking business more profitable for the general run of banks, but that we have a system of branch banks such as they have in Canada.

Mr. McFADDEN. Oh, the gentleman knows that I am entirely opposed to extending branch banking in the United States. [Applause.] It is a system of further centralization, and what we need in banking in the United States is decentralization, giving the people some control over what shall be done with their own money; they are deprived of that right now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks by placing in the RECORD the balance of this statement which I had intended to deliver. I would also like to insert an analysis of the other paragraph of the bill.

This analysis is as follows:

This summary illustrates the effect of the various provisions of the bill.

TITLE II

SEC. 201. Federal Bank-Liquidating Board: A board of five members under this title is established, consisting of the Secretary of the Treasury, Comptroller of the Currency, and three presidential appointees, not more than one of the three to be of the same political party, term of office four years, salary of appointees $10,000 each, the board to elect its own chairman and other officers and employ help.

SEC. 201a. Federal guaranty fund: A Federal guaranty fund for depositors in member banks of the Federal reserve system is established. There is to be paid into the fund—

(1) By the Government, the franchise tax heretofore paid to the United States (1914–1930, inclusive)	$147,126,882
(2) By Federal reserve banks, $150,000,000 of the surplus now in the hands of the 12 Federal reserve banks, each bank to pay an amount which bears the same ratio to the said $150,000,000 as its surplus bears to total surplus of the 12 banks on December 31, 1931	150,000,000
(3) By member banks, a total not to exceed (unless a less amount is fixed by the board)	200,000,000

The above would make an initial fund aggregating nearly $500,000,000. With respect to the $200,000,000 maximum payment, assuming it is required of member banks, each bank must pay an amount which bears the same ratio to $130,000,000 as its average deposits, other than "time," during the preceding calendar year bear to the average deposits of all member banks; and each bank must pay a further amount which bears the same ratio to $70,000,000 as its average "time" deposits during the preceding calendar year bear to the total "time" deposits of all member banks.

The deposits other than time of all member banks on December 31 were $19,430,544,000 and a payment of $130,000,000 would be equivalent to a payment by all the banks of over six-tenths of 1 per cent of their average deposits other than time. The time deposits of all member banks on December 31 were $11,315,842,000 and the payment of $70,000,000 by all member banks would be the equivalent of over six-tenths of 1 per cent of their time deposits. As to individual banks the percentage would be greater or less according to the amount of their deposits.

SEC. 202. (b) Additional assessments upon member banks if necessary: If the board finds the payment under subdivision (a) inadequate, it may after 12 months make an annual assessment upon member banks of the whole or any part of $100,000,000, each bank to pay an amount which bears the same ratio to the total as its net earnings will bear to the net earnings of all member banks for the preceding calendar year.

It may be pertinently asked: In case the fund is depleted by failures of poorly managed guaranteed banks, how long will sound member banks, if not driven out by the original contribution, remain in the system when called upon for additional contributions?

SEC. 202. (c) Payments subject to call of board: Sums payable by Federal reserve banks or member banks are subject to call of the board, in whole or in part, at such times as it may fix.

SEC. 202. (d) Refunds by board: If the guaranty fund is found more than adequate, the board may refund to each Federal reserve bank and to each national bank an amount which bears the same ratio to the excess as the amount which each such bank contributed.

It is to be noted that this omits any provision for a refund to State member banks.

SEC. 202. (e) Investment of guaranty fund: Investment is limited to (1) interest-bearing direct obligations of the Government, (2) non-interest-bearing deposits in member banks.

Sec. 203. Investment of assets and deposits of insolvent national bank: Upon certificate of insolvency the board shall wind up the bank in the manner provided by existing law, except as modified by this act, and within 30 days a committee of three—one appointed by the board, one by the owners of a majority of the stock, and one by depositors owning over 50 per cent of the deposits—shall make an estimate of the value of the assets, the amount of liabilities, and a statement of the amount due each depositor.

Sec. 204. Payment of depositors of insolvent national bank: Upon the basis of an approved estimate, whether or not modified by the board, it must pay each depositor—

(a) Within 60 days after certificate of insolvency not less than 50 per cent on deposits of $1,000 or less and not less than 25 per cent where the deposit exceeds $1,000; or $500, whichever is greater;

(b) Within six months thereafter, on deposits of $1,000 or less, the difference between the amount of the deposit and the amount paid under (a);

(c) Within six months thereafter, not less than 25 per cent to all depositors whose deposits are still unpaid; and

(d) Within six months thereafter, all deposits shall be paid in full.

SEC. 205. Board can borrow on assets of insolvent national bank: Power is given to borrow money secured by the assets of any insolvent national bank, for the purpose of making payments to depositors and other creditors of the bank and the fund must be only so used.

SEC. 206. Payments to depositors of insolvent State member bank: The board shall request the receiver or liquidating agent of an insolvent State member bank to submit a report and estimate, containing the same matter as required in section 203 in case of an insolvent national bank and, upon approval of the report and estimate, shall make payments of amounts equal to the amounts which would have been paid depositors of insolvent national banks under section 204; such payments to be made to the receiver or liquidating agent in trust for the depositors.

Sec. 207. Penalty for noncompliance: In case of failure of any member bank to comply with the provisions of Title II or any regulation made by the board thereunder, the board, after hearing, may require surrender of its stock in the Federal reserve bank and forfeiture of membership. In the case of a national bank the bank forfeits all its rights, privileges, and franchises under the national bank and Federal reserve acts.

Sec. 208. Regulations of board: The board is authorized to make necessary regulations under Title II.

Sec. 209. Appropriation: There is authorized an appropriation of such sums as are necessary to carry out the provisions of the act.

I also would like to insert at the close of my remarks a brief voicing the opposition of the American Bankers' Association to this particular bill, which brief was prepared by their general counsel.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, I did not understand whose brief it was.

Mr. MCFADDEN. A brief prepared by the general counsel of the American Bankers' Association.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And the gentleman is presenting that to bolster his own argument?

Mr. MCFADDEN. Oh, no. It is a fair legal analysis by Judge Paton, who is a very fair lawyer and who has analyzed this bill. I will not put it in if the gentleman objects.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The reason I inquired is that I have heard the gentleman criticize that same association very ably and with justification.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask if the gentleman will not yield himself one additional minute to answer a question which I would like to ask him?

Mr. MCFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself one additional minute in order to answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. MAY. I was very much interested in the argument made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania on the subject of the alleged discrimination of this bill against a well-managed bank and in favor of a badly managed bank. I wanted to ask if the gentleman does not think that ignores the real purpose and intent of this bill, which is the protection of the depositors and not the stockholders or the bank particularly?

Mr. MCFADDEN. No. I do not think I ignored that angle of it. I realize that this bill is intended to protect the depositors, but I think it is a question as to the method they are pursuing to do that.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Kentucky. Is there any difference of opinion as to the cost of $3,200 for a $1,000,000 bank between the gentleman and other members of the committee?

Mr. MCFADDEN. I have not discussed that with the other members of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MCFADDEN. I insert now the brief prepared by Thomas B. Paton, general counsel of the American Bankers' Association, heretofore referred to:

The American Bankers' Association has long been opposed to the compulsory guaranty of bank deposits in any form. Nearly a quarter of a century ago, at the inception of the movement for the enactment of deposit guaranty laws in certain Western States, the association at its annual convention held in Denver, Colo., in September, 1908, adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the American Bankers' Association is unalterably opposed to any arbitrary plan looking to the mutual guaranty of deposits, either by a State or the Nation, for the following reasons:

"1. It is a function outside of State or National Government.
"2. It is unsound in principle.
"3. It is impracticable and misleading.
"4. It is revolutionary in character.
"5. It is subversive to sound economics.
"6. It will lower the standard of our present banking system.
"7. It is productive of and encourages bad banking.
"8. It is a delusion that a tax upon the strong will prevent failures of the weak.
"9. It discredits honesty, ability, and conservatism.
"10. A loss suffered by one bank jeopardizes all banks.
"11. The public must eventually pay the tax.
"12. It will cause and not avert panics.

"Resolved, That the American Bankers' Association is unalterably opposed to any arbitrary plan looking to the mutual guaranty of deposits, either by a State or the Nation, believing it to be impractical, unsound, misleading, revolutionary in character, and subversive to sound economics, placing a tool in the hands of the unscrupulous and inexperienced for reckless banking, and knowing further that such a law would weaken our banking system and jeopardize the interest of the people."

Again, in May, 1918, this action was reaffirmed when the American Bankers' Association, through its executive council, opposed a bill (S. 4426) pending in the Senate which provided for the guaranty of national-bank deposits.

The unfortunate and disastrous experiment with State guaranty laws enacted in eight States during the period from 1908 to 1917, inclusive, well justifies the reasons and predictions set forth in the foregoing resolution.

HISTORY OF STATE LEGISLATION

During the period from 1908 to 1917 the following States enacted guaranty laws which in every case have proved disastrous, because they have tended to demoralize sound banking and accentuated rather than prevented losses to depositors:

Oklahoma	1908
Kansas	1909
Texas	1909
Nebraska	1909
Mississippi	1914
South Dakota	1915
Washington	1917

The disastrous results led to repeal in 1923 of the Oklahoma law; in 1927 of the Texas law; in 1929 of the Kansas, North Dakota, and Washington laws; and in 1930 of the Nebraska law, coupled in the last-named State with the enactment of a depositors' final settlement fund, to be maintained for 10 years by an annual assessment of two-tenths of 1 per cent on average daily deposits. The South Dakota law is still in effect, but it is a complete failure and there is a hopeless deficit. In the last biennial report of the superintendent of banks for South Dakota (June, 1930) it is stated that the legislature of 1927 amended the depositors' guaranty law under which depositors of banks closed subsequent to July 1, 1927, are not entitled to any benefit from the depositors' guaranty fund but only from the individual guaranty fund established by each bank for the protection of its own depositors.

In the remaining State, Mississippi, chapter 22, Laws of 1930, provides for the suspension of the operation of part of the law until the outstanding guaranty certificates are liquidated and at a special session in 1931 a law was passed for the issuing of bonds to raise funds for the payment of guaranty certificates.

Earlier in our history, a century ago, the State of New York made an initial experiment of this nature. In 1829 a bank guaranty law was enacted. Under the operation of this law the guaranty fund became bankrupt in 1837, and the law was repealed in 1842.

Guaranty of deposits having proved a failure under State, it would equally prove a failure under national auspices. It is unfair to sound, well-managed banks, because it makes them contribute to a fund to make good the mistakes of their weaker brethren; and it encourages unsound banking, because there is no need for a depositor, knowing that his deposit is guaranteed, to discriminate between the bank which is carefully and prudently managed and one whose management is not so prudent and which, with a deposit fund more easily augmented because of the guaranty, will make loans and investments regarded as unsafe by the more carefully managed bank. The inevitable result is the failure of an increasing number of mismanaged banks and the ultimate bankruptcy of the guaranty fund.

The late James B. Forgan, of Chicago, pertinently said: "Is there anything in the relations existing between banks and their customers to justify the proposition that in the banking business the good should be taxed to pay for the bad; ability taxed to pay for incompetency; honesty taxed to pay for dishonesty; experience and training taxed to pay for the errors of inexperience and lack of training; and knowledge taxed to pay for the mistakes of ignorance?"

Believing that the compulsory guaranty of bank deposits is unsound in principle, and this having been demonstrated by the experience of nine States, it would seem that before any serious attempt is made to extend the guaranty plan to all the banks in the Federal reserve system a thorough investigation should be made of the operation of the guaranty-fund system and its effect upon the welfare of the banks and of the people in those States which have given it a trial and abolished it.

EXPERIENCES IN STATES

In the limited time available for the preparation of this brief it is impossible to go fully into the unfortunate experiences resulting from the operation of guaranty laws in the States in which they were adopted.

JUDICIAL CONDEMNATION IN SOUTH DAKOTA

The Supreme Court of South Dakota, in State v. Smith (234 N. W. Rep. 764), decided January 30, 1931, had before it a case involving the determination of the then situation in that State with reference to the guaranty of deposit law. The court said that any intelligent consideration of the problems presented necessarily required a consideration of the history of the bank guaranty law in the State and of operations thereunder and the present status of conditions pertaining to such law. After reviewing in detail the history of the law, the court reached the following conclusion (Id. p. 781):

"The inescapable facts in this case render necessary the conclusion that the guaranty-fund scheme proved in actual operation, under the conditions which it was required to meet and for whatever reasons, entirely unable to accomplish what was hoped for it. Whatever assets remain in the insolvent banks wherein their deposits were made properly applicable to that purpose will, of course, be received by the petitioners, but we can see no reasonable expectation of their receiving anything from the guaranty fund beyond what is now therein. The facts are harsh, but undoubtedly the quicker they are faced and realized by all concerned and false and specious hopes abandoned the better the situation will be. The guaranty-fund experiment in this, as in other States where it was attempted, has failed completely."

In an article in the Encyclopædia of the Social Sciences (Vol. II, p. 417) on the Guaranty of Bank Deposits, by T. Bruce Robb, the following summary of the experiences in the different States is given:

"The insurance of bank deposits as found in the guaranty laws was designed to reduce loss caused by bank failures. As an insurance system it has little to contribute to the solution of this problem, for the prime function of insurance is to distribute rather than to eliminate loss. Its proponents, who hoped that the feeling of security engendered by the guaranty laws would minimize runs on banks in times of stress, regarded the guaranty scheme as a distinct contribution to banking reform. As such it has been of minor importance. The avoidance of bank failures depends primarily on a thorough system of bank supervision, the insistence on adequate financial resources, and the development of a trained bank management."

DISASTROUS RESULTS IN OKLAHOMA

The following excerpt from an article by Frank J. Wikoff, president Tradesmen's National Bank, Oklahoma City, Okla., published in the Journal of the American Bankers' Association for July, 1923, clearly pictures the disastrous results of the Oklahoma law, which was enacted in part as a political measure and on the theory that while a mutual guaranty by a small number of banks might fail, a large number would succeed on the law of averages:

"Since the passage of the guaranty law in 1907 a total of about 1,000 State banks have been organized. About 450 are now in business, 255 have been nationalized, 125 consolidated with others, about 125 have failed, and about 50 have been liquidated.

"During the period of its existence solvent banks paid into the fund about $3,500,000. There is something over $10,000,000 of unpaid obligations outstanding, for which no warrants have been issued, and about $1,500,000 of outstanding guaranty-fund warrants, which are in the hands chiefly of existing State banks. In some instances national banks are carrying such warrants for State banks, but this is not considerable and usually where there exists some affiliation.

"The law was repealed unconditionally in the closing days of the last legislature. There is approximately $12,000,000 worth of more or less ragged assets in the hands of the board, half of it utterly worthless, the other half worth from 5 to 30 cents on the dollar, if efficient and persistent efforts were made, which is not probable.

"Under unappealed provisions of the law the collections of assets must go to pay outstanding warrants in the order of their issuance. This has been obviated some by keeping a closed bank in the hands of a liquidating agent who applied collections to the payment of the depositors for a certain period. These complications will probably be worked out in a series of lawsuits; the probabilities are the depositors will lose several millions finally, but it is likely that the warrants outstanding will in some way ultimately get paid.

"To sum it up, 15 years' experience with the guaranty of deposits in Oklahoma has cost the honest State bankers and the trustful depositors of the State together nearly $15,000,000; the banking business has been disrupted and in turmoil; two bankers' associations have existed, with their attendant expenses and jealousies; and no appreciable good has come to any interest in the State except to those receiving fees and salaries in connection with its administration.

"It is probably the most expensive effort yet made by a State in which honest people are called upon to prove, at great expense, that the average politician's theories work out to the detriment of everybody but the politician himself."

FAILURE OF SYSTEM IN TEXAS

The absolute failure of the guaranty system in Texas is well pictured in an article by W. A. Philpott, jr., secretary of the Texas Bankers' Association, published in the Journal of the American Bankers' Association for March, 1927. We make the following extracts:

"The Texas Legislature in 1909 passed the guaranty fund act, which became effective on January 1, 1910. It was opposed by practically all the outstanding and far-seeing bankers, both State and National, in Texas at that time. It is interesting at this date to read some of the flaming arguments against the law back in 1909, arguments and prophecies which the years have sustained and fulfilled. But here was the law and all State banks—some 750 of them—were forced into the guaranty-fund plan, or its corollary, the bond system. Only 60 banks became bond banks. Then began the period of wildest promotion, the greatest bank expansion Texas had ever seen. Fortunately there were a number of very strong men in the banking commissioner's chair, else nothing could have stopped the organization of banks. The passage of the law was the signal for every fellow out of a job, whether or not he had banking experience, to open a bank and offer the depositing public the same degree of safety afforded by the old, well-established, conservative banker, with ample capital and seasoned experience.

"Everything ran merrily on with the guaranty fund for the first 10 years. Banks were organized in every town and hamlet until the peak of more than 1,000 banks was reached. Everyone hung out the sign, "Guaranty Fund Bank" and was allowed to advertise the statement that no depositor had ever lost a dollar in a guaranty-fund bank in Texas. From January 1, 1910, to January 1, 1920, some 20 guaranty-fund banks failed in Texas, with a resultant loss to member banks who paid the depositors of only about $1,000,000—not a bad record for 10 years. There were honest and good men who believed in the plan. Bankers of recognized ability insisted that the guaranty-fund system was the greatest piece of constructive legislation ever enacted in the country. They pointed to its record of 10 years. They preached the plan at bankers' conventions. They expanded with pride over the fund's accomplishments and growing importance.

"Then came the depression, the hard times, the deflation, the failures, beginning in 1920. In six years, or up to January 1, 1926, there were 150 failures of guaranty-fund banks in Texas, 52 of which were reorganized by the department without loss to the fund. The good and solvent banks of Texas during that time paid to the depositors of failed banks upward of $17,000,000—and there were many more failures in sight. Guaranty-fund assessments (as much as 2 per cent per year of the average November deposits, the high season) eliminated dividends, consumed surpluses, and in many instances impaired capital stock. Then the State bankers awoke from the beautiful dream which pictures the guaranty fund as a magic wand. Their stockholders began to ask about dividends, and all the sound and conscientious State bankers in Texas lost considerable sleep, giving serious thought to the perplexities and the problems of the guaranty fund. Still more failures, and accentuated assessments loomed ahead. Many of the wiser ones surrendered their State charters, secured national charters, took their loss, and started with a clean slate.

"The cry for relief was so widespread and the pinch so universal that the legislature in 1925 amended the law, permitting State banks to convert to a bond plan—a provision not in the original act—which compelled the bank either to contribute to guaranty fund or to protect its depositors under guaranty-bond provisions. The 1925 amendment provided that a bank could be relieved of guaranty-fund liability by furnishing a bond the size of its capital stock, either a personal or surety bond, to be approved by the commissioner. There was a scramble by the guaranty-fund banks to 'get from under.' Of the 850 guaranty-fund banks at the time, all were quickly converted except 24, whose affairs were too weak to be permitted to change. Before the guaranty fund was repealed by the present new law several of the few remaining fund banks failed and the rest were too weak to stand assessments, so that some time will elapse before the depositors will be paid.

"Since the State banking law was passed in 1905 there have been chartered about 1,500 State banks. Of this number, 850 remain to-day, out from under the guaranty-fund yoke, each standing on its own bottom, each eagerly glad that the past is behind. More than 100 have taken out national charters, the one and only reason being to escape the guaranty fund liability. The guaranty-fund plan in Texas has cost the good, well-managed, and solvent State banks approximately $20,000,000. It's a rather dear experience."

CRITICISM OF SOUTH DAKOTA LAW

The failure of the guaranty law in South Dakota is fully described in an article by E. S. Sparks, dean of the College of Agriculture and Science, University of South Dakota, published in the Journal of the Amewrican Bankers' Association for February, 1927, in which he shows that after 12 years of operation, the guaranty fund system of that State stood as a complete failure. At that time there was a hopeless deficit, growing larger each day; the fund had an annual income of less than $300,000 to meet $50,000,000 indebtedness, and his criticism is that a law of this character is an aid to unsound banking. We make the following extracts:

"A large deficit, growing larger each day marks the present dilemma of the guaranty fund.

"The total receipts under the law from assessments of banks from February 1, 1916, to January 1, 1926, were $3,167,473. Of this amount, $3,068,200 had been used by January 1, 1926, to pay depositors of closed banks, to make readjustments, and to manage failed banks. There had been received back into the fund from the liquidation of assets of failed banks $221,547. This left a balance of $320,820 still unused at the close of the year 1925. If we add to this the assessment income for the year 1926, amounting to $265,907, we have $586,727, and whatever may be realized from the liquidation of the assets of failed banks, to meet the total liabilities of the guaranty fund.

"As to the liabilities, the total is fast approaching the staggering figure of $50,000,000. According to law, this unpaid liability was to be represented by negotiable certificates bearing an annual interest of 5 per cent. Under these conditions we have the interesting situation of an annual income of less than $300,000 trying to pay off an indebtedness of nearly $50,000,000 with an annual income increase of nearly $2,500,000. It is estimated, however, that the liquidation of the assets of failed banks may reduce this from 30 to 50 per cent, but the situation seems to be hopeless, even if the most optimistic estimates are realized.

"On January 1, 1926, this indebtedness was represented by $30,582,140 of certificates of indebtedness outstanding, by $1,901,825 of authorized certificates, and by $10,894,026 of undetermined deposit claims. Total liabilities were $43,377,992 on that date; but due to numerous bank failures during the year 1926, this has increased to nearly $50,000,000.

"Up to March 1, 1923, the guaranty fund was solvent and paid all claims in full, but between March 1, 1923, and March 1, 1924, the number of bank failures was such that payments could not be made in full, and since then payments have been made only on the percentage basis. In cases where banks failed prior to March 1, 1923, and litigation delayed payment from the guaranty fund, the State supreme court now holds that claimants in the cases, if they finally succeed in establishing their claims, are entitled to the same rights as if the claims had been allowed at the time the bank failed.

"In this connection the trend of bank failures is interesting. From 1916 to 1922 the number of State banks increased from 498 to 562 and the average number of banks in suspension at any one time was about 13. But a radical change took place in the biennium from 1922 to 1924. Bank failures during this period increased from 13 to 139, or 126 new bank failures occurred. From 1924 to September 30, 1926, 93 more banks failed, bringing the total to 232 failed banks. This has been increased lately by some 20 bank failures, so that at present about 50 per cent of the State banks of South Dakota have become insolvent, bringing all the disturbed conditions generally prevalent with the breaking down of the credit mechanism.

"One of the biggest indictments of the guaranty law in South Dakota is that it stimulated reckless and irresponsible banking and created an attitude of false security for bank deposits. State banks were allowed to advertise on their windows and in the newspapers that their deposits were guaranteed by the State. Hence the impression grew that State bank deposits were entirely protected and that, if the banks failed, the State would make up the loss. No wide efforts were made on the part of the State banking department to correct this situation and to show that deposits were protected only up to the extent of the guaranty fund, which would prove insufficient in case of numerous bank failures.

"Again, the act became operative during a period of rising prices and great business optimism. Entirely too many banks had been organized and credit became easy and highly speculative. Banks were not properly examined and regulated as to reserves and legitimate loans. Under conditions like these, the guranty law undoubtedly stimulated recklessness in banking. Many citizens of the State now hold that, since people were allowed generally to believe that their deposits were safely protected, the State is morally obligated to make up the loss through taxation, although there is no such obligation in the act itself.

"As was pointed out above, the strong banks have felt that the principle is wrong, since it allows weak banks a competitive advantage which their business does not justify and burdens unjustly conservative banking without eliminating the weakness of unsound banking.

"From the above facts it seems safe to assume that under the recent banking conditions in South Dakota, the guaranty law promoted rather than retarded unsafe and unsound banking. It was especially pernicious in that it failed to focus attention on the individual strength of the local bank itself. It hindered the belief, so fundamental to sound banking, that a banking institution and its liabilities are no more sound than the business practices of its directing bankers."

It is unnecessary to extend this brief by reference to the experiences of the other guaranty law States where like results followed.

IDAHO REJECTED BANK GUARANTY

In 1923 the Governor of Idaho, under authority of the legislature, appointed an Idaho banking code commission to study the banking laws and to recommend a banking code. Among the propositions considered for inclusion in this code was a bank guaranty law.

The report of the commission made to the governor December 8, 1924, recites that: "A candid study of the operations of all of these bank guaranty acts has shown them in the first instance to have misled the public, and ultimately to have proven failures, tending to demoralize sound banking, in the end accentuating rather than preventing losses to depositors."

The report, which recommended that the suggestion for inclusion of a bank guaranty law in the proposed code, be disapproved, summarized the objections as follows:

"(a) In all bank guaranty laws so far enacted a maximum annual assessment has been fixed in order to prevent destruction of the entire system during any severe period of depression. Experience has shown that assessments against the remaining banks sufficient to pay all deposits upon closing of failed institutions would impair the capital stock of the remaining banks to such an extent that they would all close. As a result depositors of failed institutions are not paid upon the failure of banks, and hence the so-called bank guaranty laws do not pay deposits. The total deposits of State banks closed in Idaho since 1919 amount to $4,917,186.26, of which there has been paid to date $365,000, leaving a balance unpaid of $4,552,186.26. The capital stock and surplus of the remaining State banks now in operation total $4,153,339.80. A bank guaranty law which would have paid deposits would have wiped out the entire State banking system of Idaho with its $30,163,147.56 of deposits.

"(b) The future strength of our banking system must depend upon the development of sound, conservative banking and discrimination on the part of the public which will encourage such banking. Bank guaranty laws tend to retard the unsensational process of strengthening the banking system by strict regulation, vigilant public opinion, and strict requirements with regard to the ability of organizers and the minima of capitalization. A bank guaranty law tends to put all banks on the same plane and there is no special incentive for maintaining the reputation and prestige of a banking institution by careful, conservative banking. In fact, the bank which would depart most from conservative banking practice and assume the greatest speculative risks would be the popular bank and the one enjoying the largest volume of business. Integrity, financial ability, and responsibility form the very essentials of banking, and any effort to supplant such with a bank guaranty law can only invite eventual disaster."

FEDERAL GUARANTY PROPOSAL OF 1918

In 1918 a bill introduced by Senator Shafroth (S. 4426) having the indorsement of the then Comptroller of the Currency, John Skelton Williams, providing for the guaranty of deposits in national banks up to $5,000, was reported favorably by the Committee on Banking and Currency to the Senate. As indicated above, the American Bankers' Association strongly opposed the passage of this bill. Although at that time the unfortunate results of State guaranty laws had not become fully apparent, the bill failed of passage in the Senate because of its unsoundness in principle. In addition to widespread protests from different sections of the country there were strong protests from the clearing-house associations of New York and Chicago, under date of May 9 and 10, 1918, respectively, which are quoted below because they well summarize the reasons why any proposition for the guaranty of deposits of national and member banks by assessments upon all the banks should not be enacted into law.

The protest of the New York Clearing House Association is as follows:

"The undersigned, constituting the entire membership of the New York Clearing House Association, earnestly protest against the enactment into law of Senate bill No. 4426, and desire respectfully to present the following brief expression of their views on the principle and policy of the guaranty of deposits:

"Senate bill 4426, now pending in the United States Senate, puts a premium upon incompetence. It proposes that the Government of the United States guarantee all deposits in national banks of $5,000 and less, and that the Government guarantee up to $5,000 all deposits in excess of that amount; of course, this guaranty is to be made good at the expense of the conservatively managed and successful banks.

"Should such a proposition be enacted into law any national bank, however inexperienced its official managers, however limited its capital resources compared to the field of its activities, however given to risky adventure, however venturesome in buying deposits by paying excessive rates of interest, however wanting in the proven qualities which time and experience have shown to be indispensable to successful bank management, such a bank would, nevertheless, be able to solicit business, truthfully claiming that their deposits were protected as above stated by the combined financial strength of the whole national system. Good banks would thus be compelled to give of their strength to induce the creation of and then to support incompetent rivals.

"Such a proposition is in violation of common justice and common fairness. The stockholders in a bank in one locality would be mulcted in loss to compensate for the mismanagement of banks hundreds or even thousands of miles distant and over which no mutual control or relationship exists.

"Our people should be allowed to exercise wholesome discrimination in the banks they select, as well as in their business activities in general. Individuality and individual initiative are cardinal qualities of success, and these qualities would be impaired if people are to be taught by legislation to rely upon the Government to help them in their ordinary individual transactions and in the exercise of ordinary judgment.

"'The said bill is wrong in principle; it imposes an unjust burden upon conservative bank management, and would exercise a deleterious influence upon every community, should it become law.'"

The protest of the Chicago Clearing House Association is as follows:

"The taxation of the sound and conservatively managed national banks, which form the overwhelming majority, for the benefit of the depositors of the very few, which are unsound and recklessly managed, we consider unjust and inequitable for the following reasons:

"'It proposes to tax good banks to support bad; to penalize honesty, ability, experience, and training to compensate for incompetency, dishonesty, and ignorance; it removes from banking the essential characteristic on which success in the business has been based, viz, the necessity for maintaining reputation for character, prudence, foresight, sagacity, and conservatism. It proposes to place the reckless and speculative banks on the same level with the best managed and the most conservative, which will lead to competition calculated to drag all of them down to the least meritorious.

"'Under the protection of such an act banks by granting their customers accommodations contrary to all sound banking principles and methods would take business away from the sound ones, while to the extent of their contributions to the guaranty fund sound institutions would be required to support the unsound in their recklessness, besides giving them a standing and credit which they could not otherwise obtain.

"'The proposed legislation therefore does not give the honest and well-managed banks a square deal; it places a premium on dishonest and reckless banking and will go far to destroy the incentive of banks and bankers to establish for themselves a good name and reputation in their various communities.'"

PROMOTION OF RECKLESS BANKING

There is abundant evidence that the tendency of guaranty laws in the past has been to increase the number of banks far beyond needed requirements, and beyond the number that would produce a profit to the stockholders, and that such laws invite the establishment of banks by irresponsible and unexperienced men who will advertise that deposits of their institutions are secured by the guaranty fund.

A pamphlet issued by Daniel W. Hogan of Oklahoma City in 1908 contains numerous illustrations of such a tendency. For example, shortly after the enactment of the Oklahoma law, application was made to the bank commissioner to start a fourth bank at Prague, a town of 249 people. The bank commissioner refused the application on the ground that there were too many banks. The applicants appealed to the district court, and an opinion was handed down that the banking board had no right to refuse a charter to applicants for a State bank; that the fact that other banks of the town objected, or that an objection was raised on the grounds that the applicant was inexperienced in the banking business, was not a matter for the board to consider, but that they were compelled under the law to issue a charter to any corporation seeking one as long as the papers were properly executed.

Another instance cited by Mr. Hogan: The president of a national bank was also a merchant and failed in business and was compelled to go through bankruptcy. Naturally he had to resign his connection with the national bank. He thereupon took out a charter and became president of a State bank in Oklahoma.

In another case, a man, when prohibition closed up his saloon, relinquished that business and started up a bank and, because of the protection to depositors given by the guaranty law, was able to secure in a short time between $30,000 to $40,000 of deposits.

The above is merely illustrative of hundreds of similar instances which could be established by testimony in any investigation of the results of the operation of State guaranty laws by reckless operators of banks which have, through glaring advertisements, invited deposits at a high rate of interest emphasizing the fact: "Your deposits are guaranteed by the State."

We have attempted in the foregoing to set forth sufficient facts and experiences growing out of the operation of State guaranty systems, to demonstrate that such systems have proved failures and highly disastrous; that they do not protect depositors, but have a tendency to promote unsound banking.

FEDERAL GUARANTY WILL NOT PROTECT

The argument has been made that the breakdown of State guaranty systems does not necessarily mean that an enlarged Federal system covering the whole country with a sufficiently large fund to guarantee the deposits in member banks and embracing a wider distribution of risks, would not effectually protect depositors. Aside from the unfairness of penalizing good banks to make good the losses of bad banks, it is respectfully submitted that no such system of Federal guaranty, as comprehended by the Steagall bill, would ultimately survive.

The fundamental plan of the Steagall bill is the same as that of the former Oklahoma and other systems—the creation of a guaranty fund by uniform assessment upon all the banks out of which to pay the depositors of those banks in the system which fail. It is virtually an insurance plan, but not based upon sound principles of insurance. An insurance plan, to be successful, must be based upon an analysis and thorough study of the risks involved; there must be a classification of risks and gradation of premium rates according to the character of the risk. A high risk involves a correspondingly high premium and there are some risks so bad as to be ineligible for insurance. Under the proposed Federal guaranty plan there is no classification of risks nor gradation of rates.

Notwithstanding banks in certain sections of the country, based on past experience, are more likely to fail than banks in other sections, all are compelled to contribute equally to the insurance fund. The inevitable result of such a plan of assessment would be that the banks, unduly discriminated against in the matter of rates, would leave the system, for the premiums or enforced contributions are not in due proportion to the risk. Under this proposed law the stockholder of one bank would have nothing to say about the location of other banks; no voice in determining how much capital shall be invested in any particular locality nor in the selection of the board of directors or officers; no right to examine its books nor familiarize himself with its operations and no share in its profits. Nevertheless he would be subjected to a charge for payment, pro rata, of its debts; for the purpose of liability only, but not for profit, he would be made a stockholder of every member bank in the Federal reserve system. How long would such a system continue?

We firmly maintain that no ultimate beneficial results to depositors would follow the enactment of a Federal guaranty law because the principle is wrong and, even under national auspices and no matter how well supervised, the tendency would be to open the door to the reckless and incompetent to establish banks and to speculate with the money of depositors which they would not receive but for the guaranty. We believe that no such system could long survive, for it would encourage the increase of bad banking at the expense of good banking, and ultimately result in the collapse of the banking structure. Aside from this, there is the unfairness of compelling a sound, well-managed bank whose depositors need no protection to contribute to a fund for the protection of the depositors of the unsound, poorly managed bank. Well may the country banker in a small village who has earned and deserves the confidence of the depositors in his bank, complain should he be compelled to contribute to a fund from which would be paid the depositors of a large institution in a distant city which, through mismanagement or worse, has been closed by the authorities.

IN CONCLUSION

The purpose of legislation of this character is to insure to the depositor the safety of his deposit. Under true principles of insurance each voluntary participant contributes commensurately with the risk; the greater the risk, the more he pays. The proposition for Federal guaranty, as has been the case with past State guaranty systems, would deviate from this true principle by seeking to establish a compulsory insurance system in which the good risk is compelled to contribute equally with the bad.

We respectfully submit that the safety of the depositor will not be ultimately secured by any such system but that the object can best be accomplished by effective supervision to insure sound bank management.

Appended is a summary of Title II, H. R. 10241, with comment upon the effect of the guaranty of deposit provisions.

FOR THE AMERICAN BANKERS ASSOCIATION,
THOMAS B. PATON, General Counsel.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I incline to opposition to this bill primarily because of the disastrous consequences that have resulted in all States that have tried bank deposit guaranties. I am opposed to it also because it places an immediate burden upon the taxpayers of the Nation of $150,000,000. Third, I am opposed to it because this appears to me to be an attempt to place the burden of supplying the resources for this guaranty fund upon the larger States, upon my State of New York, upon New Jersey, upon Pennsylvania, whereas the smaller States would contribute hardly anything to the fund, as will be seen from the very interesting data which I have just compiled from data furnished by the Federal Reserve Board.

We tried this scheme of deposits guaranty in New York State back in 1829. The fund became bankrupt in 1837, and the law, as far as New York State was concerned, was abolished in 1842.

Time will not permit me to go into the dismal failure of that statute in my State, but following the lead of New York State, other States adopted this guaranty of bank deposits. Oklahoma adopted it in 1908 and repealed it in 1923. Kansas adopted it in 1909, as did Texas and Nebraska. Texas repealed in 1927, Kansas in 1929. In 1914 Mississippi adopted it. In 1915 South Dakota adopted it, in 1917 North Dakota and Washington. North Dakota and Washington repealed in 1929.

Nebraska was compelled to repeal the statute in 1930, when it sought to liquidate the guaranty fund by the enactment of a depositors' final settlement fund, which is to be maintained for 10 years by an annual assessment of two-tenths of 1 per cent on the average daily deposit of all Nebraska banks.

The banks in Nebraska have complained bitterly about the statute. In the beginning some of the banks were in favor of the statute; others bitterly opposed it. The latter class felt that there was a taking away from the security of the depositors in going banks in order to pay depositors in failed banks.

As time went on, the assessments against the banks grew in amount. Many banks had failed; the guaranty did not save any bank from failing.

The United States Supreme Court, in the case of Abie State Bank against Bryan, Two hundred and eighty-second United States Reports, at page 770, gives a history of the situation in which it indicates the oppressive features of this plan upon the going banks.

The district court reviewed the results of the operations of the banks in Nebraska under the bank guaranty law. It appeared that there were 1,012 banks in the State (of Nebraska) in November, 1920, and that the number had been reduced to 726 in December, 1923; that these banks had a total capital of $19,001,000 and a total capital and surplus of $24,958,557.62; that for the period of 18 months preceding June 30, 1928, 750 banks had net earnings and 156 had net deficits; that the total net earnings of both groups for that period amounted to $1,935,519.40, or 7.9 per cent of the total capital and surplus; that during the same period these banks had paid into the depositors' guaranty fund $2,412,324.78, more than the earnings. It also appeared from the testimony of the secretary of the guaranty fund commission (as stated by the supreme court of the State) that up to December 31, 1928, 269 State banks had been closed by the State and placed in the hands of the commission, and that the total amount of the adjudicated claims was $10,536,518.59, exclusive of interest; and that in 72 State banks, then being operated as going concerns, the amount due depositors was $13,726,441.26, and the total amount due depositors in banks which were in receiverships but whose claims were not yet adjudicated was $2,133,627.54. The total claims, including both claims adjudicated and those not adjudicated, or then existing liabilities against the guaranty fund, amounted to $26,400,282.76, and the total amount of assets to be realized would be $10,451,932.65, leaving a deficit of $15,948,350.11. The court concluded that "fully two-thirds of the banks under the existing financial conditions are unable, after paying assessments amounting to 8 per cent of their capital, to pay compensatory dividends," and that the bank guaranty law, as originally conceived, was "no longer serving its purposes."

In South Dakota, the law is still in effect, and there is a hopeless deficit which is constantly growing greater. In the remaining State, Mississippi, chapter 22 of the Laws of 1920 suspends the operations of part of the bank guaranty law until the outstanding guaranty certificates are liquidated; and at a special session of the Legislature of Mississippi last year, a law was adopted providing for the issuing of bonds to raise funds for the payment of guaranty certificates.

Thus, the general treasury is called upon to pay this deficit. The rank and file of the taxpayers of Mississippi are now asked to come to the rescue of those citizens who happened to be depositors in these unfortunate banks.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] said there was to be a payment of $150,000,000 by the Treasury into this guaranty fund. That is actually so; but where is that money coming from? It was paid originally out of the Federal reserve system to the Treasury for franchise taxes; but the money is no longer there, and it can not be said that the Federal reserve system is paying for it. It was paid. The money is now gone. It will have to be replenished. Who will pay for it? The taxpayers of the United States will have to pay for it. They will have to pay for it at the very moment when we are trying—with the whole country anxiously waiting—to balance our Budget; and instead of reducing expenditures of Government we are actually increasing expenditures of Government by compelling the Treasury to pay out $150,000,000 to this guaranty fund. We thus increase our staggering deficit by $150,000,000.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman asserts very positively that that money is gone. The act under which it was paid in provides that it be either paid into the sinking fund for the retirement of the war debt or applied to the war debt. Has the gentleman any figures or information to show that it has actually been paid?

Mr. CELLER. Yes. I have before me the hearings where the gentleman and his colleagues examined the Comptroller of the Currency, and he stated exactly those words—that the money will have to be obtained somewhere; it is not in the Treasury, and the taxpayers of the Nation would have to pay it. I believe we can rely upon the Comptroller of the Currency. How or why or when it was paid in is immaterial. It is not there. Only taxes can replace it.

Mr. STEAGALL. I may say to the gentleman the Comptroller of the Currency sent to this Capitol, and it has been introduced as an administration measure, a bill which provides for loans upon the assets of closed banks that takes this identical fund out of the Treasury.

Mr. CELLER. I do not care what other bill does this, that, or the other thing. We are considering this bill, and if it is wrong to do it in this bill, as I conceive it, it is wrong to do it in any other bill, although the other bill refers to "closed" banks. I am opposed to adding any more burden at this time to that which the taxpayers of this Nation already carry.

The total amount of the deposits in the member banks of the reserve system as of December 31, 1931, was $27,- 432,000,000. That is exclusive of what is known as interbank balances. If we add interbank balances, the total amount of deposits in the member banks was $30,746,386,000.

The bill provides that the amount of the contribution of each member bank shall be proportionate to the ratio of its deposits to the total deposits of all members in the system. How will this affect the various states? What contribution will have to be paid by the banks in my State, for example, to this common fund? Let us see.

The instant bill provides that the Federal guaranty fund for deposits in member banks shall be made up of—

First. The direct payment by the Treasury into the fund of $100,000,000.

Second. One hundred and fifty million dollars shall be paid out of the surplus of the Federal reserve banks.

Third. The Federal bank liquidating board shall also require payment into the fund by the member banks of the Federal reserve system of such amount (not to exceed $100,000,000) as may be fixed by the board, of which each such bank shall pay an amount which bears the same ratio to the sum fixed by the board as the average deposits of such bank during the preceding calendar year bear to the average deposits of all member banks during the preceding calendar year.

Fourth. Any time after 12 months, if additional sums are required, the member banks shall be assessed and shall pay an additional $100,000,000, according to their proportion of deposits.

I have prepared a table of the proportion that each State would be assessed and required to pay according to this plan.

I have taken the deposits of member banks and split up the total according to States and deducted the percentage of funds each State must contribute to the guaranty fund. Banks who are not members of the Federal reserve system are not considered, because the yardstick of contribution to the fund is amount of deposits of member banks.

New York, I will say to the Members from New York who may be present in the Chamber, will be compelled to contribute over 31.3 per cent of the entire fund. New Jersey will contribute 4.2 per cent; Pennsylvania will contribute 9.9 per cent; Ohio will contribute 4.9 per cent; Illinois will contribute 6.9 per cent; Michigan will contribute 3.8 per cent; Mississippi will contribute 2 per cent; Kansas will contribute only six-tenths of 1 per cent.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. That is the reason I am for the bill and the gentleman is not.

Mr. CELLER. Naturally, and that is why I am against it and why I want to bring the facts out so that Members from the various States can see how much they will have to contribute to the common fund.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. However, their liability is proportionate.

Mr. CELLER. Of course, the liability is proportionate; there is no doubt about that. But, of course, I do not blame the gentleman from Kansas for wanting this. His banks pay only six-tenths of 1 per cent to the fund. Why New Yorkers will vote for the bill is beyond me. New York will pay the piper to the extent of almost one-third of the total.

North Carolina will contribute four-tenths of 1 per cent; South Carolina, two-tenths of 1 per cent; Georgia, seven-tenths of 1 per cent; Florida, one-half of 1 per cent; Alabama, one-half of 1 per cent; Mississippi, two-tenths of 1 per cent; Arkansas, two-tenths of 1 per cent; Oklahoma, eight-tenths of 1 per cent; Texas, 2.3 per cent; Idaho, one-tenth of 1 per cent; Colorado, two-tenths of 1 per cent; California, 8 per cent; Nebraska, six-tenths of 1 per cent, and so on.

I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that by a perusal of these percentages the conclusion is readily reached that it is highly unfair to place this entire burden upon a few States for the benefit of all the other States; and that is why, when it comes to voting on this bill, I shall be unalterably opposed to it.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Right in that connection what was the contribution of the banks under the State laws which you say have failed?

Mr. CELLER. I shall be pleased to put data of those States in the record. I will put in my remarks a detailed statement of the statutes of each of the eight States that have adopted the guaranty plan.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. I herewith insert some detailed experiences of some of the States that tried this fantastic scheme.

NORTH DAKOTA

In our State a body of disgruntled radicals obtained political control of the State. They have done anything and everything that could be done to cripple the banking structure of the State. Where a banker would not agree with their political views a few of them would get together and organize a new bank in order to punish the banker opposing their political policies. Encouragement was given by the banking department and the governor to do this and the whole banking structure was weakened to an extent that when bank troubles developed over 300 small banks failed; and while there were only a few failures of larger banks, it was to be expected, of course, that failure of so many small banks would pull down a few of the weak, larger banks. (W. C. MacFadden, secretary of North Dakota Bankers Association. Letter of December 14, 1926.)

OKLAHOMA

It is my judgment that any law which seeks to guarantee deposits in banks is fundamentally unsound, as it places a premium on incompetence, if not actual crookedness, and opens up a field which presents temptations to the unscrupulous politician. In this State it resulted in the granting of charters promiscuously and in many instances charters were granted to inexperienced and incompetent parties. I do not assume that the inside story of the manner in which the depositors' guaranty fund in the State of Oklahoma was handled will ever be revealed, and the only good that could come from a revelation of that kind would be merely as a warning to other States which contemplate adopting a law of that kind. (O. B. Mothersead, Oklahoma State bank commissioner.)

TEXAS

* * * Many bankers have engaged in reckless and unsafe business methods of banking, upon the theory that if their banks should get into trouble the guaranty fund would come along and contribute enough fresh capital to absorb their losses. A number of dishonest bankers have systematically stolen from their banks year after year and used the funds for personal transactions and speculative deals, knowing that if their banks failed the guaranty fund would pay the depositors and there would be no demand on the part of the depositors that these dishonest officials be punished. No stretch of the imagination is required to assert that the guaranty fund as it has been administered in Texas has been a constant premium upon dishonesty and criminal recklessness and carelessness in the management of some of the banks.—Extract from "Our State Banking System," an address by Charles O. Austin, Texas commissioner of banking.

Professor McCahan, of the University of Pennsylvania, in the book, State Insurance, summarizes the causes of the failures of these State funds as follows:

The immediate cause of the disastrous losses experienced by the funds in recent years was the deflation period following upon the heels of the war boom. As a result of it, banks all over the country were hard hit, but particularly those in the agricultural belt. Many financial institutions failed and carried others down with them. Banks belonging to guaranty funds were no exception. The fund may have had some virtue in preventing a "run" upon an individual bank occasioned by lack of confidence, but it was not adequate to cope with a period of rapidly falling prices and business stagnation.

Inability of most funds to withstand the heavy financial drains upon them during this time may be traced to a number of underlying factors. Principal among these were:

1. Too great concentration of risk: These funds, for the most part, were located in States primarily agricultural. Any influences affecting crop prices were necessarily transmitted to them. Losses were accordingly very much heavier than in the country as a whole. To illustrate, for the 10-year period 1917–1926, losses of the funds from failures averaged over 2 per cent of guaranteed deposits in North Dakota and South Dakota, whereas for the entire United States the liabilities (not just those to depositors) of all failed State banks, without deduction for possible salvage of assets, averaged approximately six-tenths of 1 per cent of total individual deposits.

2. Low assessment rates: The maximum assessment rates collectible in five States did not exceed one-fourth of 1 per cent, and in three of these—Kansas, Mississippi, and Washington—only a regular levy of one-twentieth of 1 per cent was collected for a number of years, so an adequate reserve was not created. Nor were the fixed rates of one-fifth of 1 per cent in Oklahoma (subsequent to 1916) and one-fourth of 1 per cent in South Dakota enough to produce an emergency surplus of any consequence. The test in Washington came early and found that fund unprepared as respects surplus. Even its more liberal assessment privilege proved insufficient. Had it not been for the special assessment privileges possessed by the Nebraska and Texas funds, their experience would have been the same as that of others.

3. Inadequate reserves: Bank failures traceable to economic conditions necessarily tend to be concentrated in a period when all business is depressed. Their effect, accordingly, is more disastrous. Since it is the goal of a bank guaranty fund to avert this sudden shock and distribute its force over a period of years, a substantial reserve must be on hand. Time has demonstrated that the maximum limits placed upon the size of these funds were too low and the means of building them up inadequate.

4. Poor underwriting selection and supervision of risks: All going banks were covered by the compulsory funds and membership in the optional ones was not difficult of attainment. No attempt was made to proportion the rate charged to the hazard presented. It is claimed that insurance of the risk made the public more careless as to the choice of their depositories. All banks appeared to be on the same plane as regards safety, and the necessity for discriminating with respect to the character, ability, and experience of the banker was less pronounced. It is contended new banks could more easily secure deposits and recklessness was encouraged. More rigid and extensive supervision was needed than ever before, but unfortunately this did not keep pace with the problems presented by the guaranty system. Some assert political influence played a large part in determining whether or not a bank should be closed. Certain it is that the standards of membership were not maintained at the high level necessary for success.

5. Maximum salvage not obtained: In case an insolvent bank is taken over immediately and its affairs administered by competent men, the loss to depositors may be kept low. If left to run after it should be closed or if improperly handled, realization on assets may fall and expenses mount. It is impossible to ascertain the exact efficiency of various funds in keeping their losses down by this means, but there is considerable evidence to the effect they have not always exerted every effort or used the best means to keep losses at a minimum.

IOWA

We would also call attention to the experience of the Iowa State public deposit guaranty fund created in 1925.

According to Professor McCahan:

From August 1, 1925 (when the fund began operations), until January 2, 1928, the fund received in diverted interest $3,895,533 and in dividends from failed banks $2,137,046, making a total of $6,032,579. One thousand one hundred and seventy-four claims were approved and certified for payment during this time, having an aggregate value of $9,421,899. In order to meet these liabilities, $6,000,000 of anticipatory interest-bearing warrants were issued, of which approximately two and one-half millions have been retired. The maximum rate of interest has been diverted ever since the inception of this fund, but its net deficit, owing to excessively heavy losses, is still about three and a half million dollars.

According to information recently received, it would appear that at the present time the Iowa State depository fund has a deficit of approximately $13,000,000.

There seems to be united opposition on the part of the American Bankers Association, as well as the New York Bankers Association.

One financial writer writes very succinctly as follows:

Since the above bill requires that the depository fund will be established and supported by assessments against the banks whose deposits are to be guaranteed, it must logically follow that the banks must recover this assessment in some way, and the logical way will be to reduce the interest payable on public and private accounts so that the expense of maintaining the fund eventually will fall on the depositors.

The above bill will result in the strong banks who do not need its protection being taxed for the benefit of weak banks. Furthermore, the fund will place a premium on lack of conservatism in the operation of banks.

Because the fund requires only members of the Federal reserve system to join the fund, such banks will be placed in an unfair competitive position as compared with nonmember banks and will doubtless force out of business smaller banks which can not afford or can not qualify for membership in the fund.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STOKES].

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill to amend the national banking act and the Federal reserve act, and to provide a guaranty fund for depositors in banks.

I think we are all agreed that we want to help the bank depositor and the banks, but the question, as I see it, is how are we to do it along sound economic lines?

One of the principal causes of bank failures undoubtedly has been the period of unsettlement through which we have passed. When this period passes away bank failures will automatically cease.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STOKES. I yield.

Mr. GARBER. It has been suggested in an inquiry that the cause of failures of banks is the withdrawal of deposits. This may have been a contributing factor, but the main factor in the failure of the banks in this country has been the shrinkage in values, and the holding of frozen assets instead of the withdrawal of deposits.

Mr. STOKES. The American people have deposited some $47,000,000,000 in the savings banks of the country. Savings banks are not included in the bill, and I do not think they want to be. How will it affect them? This bill, as I understand it, has not been approved by the Treasury Department, or by most of the large banks, because the large banks do not feel that they need to have their deposits guaranteed. However, a good many of the small banks would like to have it, but not all of them, because in order to join the Federal reserve system they have to deposit a good deal of their money, and they may have use for that money for other purposes.

The bill removes the incentive of banks to show good management and build up good reputations. Besides, it sterilizes a certain amount of Federal reserve funds which must be laid aside to protect this guaranty which they are giving instead of letting it be used for other very useful purposes.

If the Federal reserve system desires to protect any of its member banks, it can do so by lending them money when an emergency arises.

The House a few months ago voted to appropriate large sums of Government money toward funding the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which provides emergency financing facilities for financial institutions. Why not give this a chance to function and see how it works out?

General Dawes reported recently that in the period from February 2, the first day of its operation, to April 19, inclusive, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has authorized loans to 1,520 banks and trust companies in the United States in the amount of $243,000,000, of which amount $10,000,000 has already been repaid.

The evidence of the effectiveness of its work is found in the fact that in the 71 days which preceded February 2, 756 banks, with $521,000,000 deposits, suspended in the United States; while in the 71 days from February 2, when the Reconstruction Finance Corporation started its operations, to April 12, there suspended in this country only 182 banks, less than one-fourth as many as in the preceding 71 days. As a matter of fact, however, the bulk of the bank loans in number and amount has gone to the small banks. The figures covering the period from February 2 to April 12 show that 69.2 per cent of the banks which have borrowed money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation are located in towns of less than 5,000 population and 84.6 per cent of the borrowing banks are located in towns of 25,000 population or less. [Applause.]

The Bank of the United States, which was founded by Hamilton, was supported by the Government through the deposit of money, but there was no Government guarantee.

In fact, its capital was subscribed for by a large public body of stockholders.

Secretary of the Treasury Chase, during the critical Civil War period, when there were many bank failures, did not recommend a Government guarantee, because it is a dangerous centralization of power in the Federal Government.

One of the most successful and efficient banks in the history of the world is the Bank of England, incorporated in 1694 under the title it still bears, "The Governor and Company of the Bank of England."

One of the Federal Reserve governors submitted the following statement:

> Experience in the various States that have tried out plans of this sort has been uniformly unfavorable. All such plans have broken down.
> The natural effect of such legislation is to encourage risky and speculative banking by relieving bank officers and directors of their personal responsibility for the safety of deposits.
> Moreover, it compels provident and conservative bankers to pay the losses incurred by improvident and speculative bankers.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, in my opinion the legislation proposed to guarantee bank deposits is the most important legislation that has been presented to the Seventy-second Congress.

In my humble judgment, no act of Congress would do more to restore confidence, bring to the light and into circulation the hoarded millions, and accelerate economic recovery in this country than the enactment of the legislation before us to-day.

I shall not attempt to discuss the technical mechanics of this proposed legislation, because there are a number of experienced bankers on the committee which reported this bill as well as others of banking experience, who will analyze the mechanical details. My remarks will be confined largely to the human-welfare side of the proposal.

During the past two years we have witnessed a carnival of bank failures in this country unparalleled and appalling. And following in the dismal and desolate wake of the wreckage has trailed a grim and ghastly procession of human distress, suicides, and unutterable anguish that is fearful indeed to contemplate. In my own fair State of Tennessee, in addition to the untold human misery incident to the failure of banking institutions, there have been, I am informed, seven suicides directly attributable to bank failures. Men and women who, after years of toil, had fancied they had laid up in bank a competency to provide for them in the evening of life, discovered to their dismay and horror that this security against the helplessness of old age had almost in an instant been swept away by the failure of some bank in which they had confidently placed their trust. Working men and women, in the shops and factories, over washtub and scrubbing brush, suddenly saw wiped out the savings which they had coined out of their sweat and blood and tears. Little children who had saved their pennies and, with childlike trust and simplicity, deposited them in savings banks were likewise the innocent victims of this orgy of defalcation. Thus thousands of our citizens were reduced to penury and poverty and often to desperation. Some sought solace in suicide of one form or another, while others, broken in spirit and health, are merely existing, supported by the sympathy and charity of relatives and friends. It would be difficult to estimate the number of deaths directly and indirectly resulting from bank failures during the past two years. Of course, it would be utter folly to attempt to describe the mental anguish and agony into the vortex of which thousands, yea hundreds of thousands, of our citizens have been precipitated by this epidemic of financial disorder that has swept our Nation like a terrible tornado during the past two years.

Something must be done to restore the confidence of the country in our banking institutions. Everybody concedes that there is something radically wrong with the system and agrees that it must be overhauled and safeguarded before the people will patronize it again. In the face of what has occurred during the past two years, who can blame the public for its lack of confidence in our banking systems both national and State? Who can censure the man who withholds or withdraws his money from banks and hoards and secretes it where he knows he can find it when he needs it? Until the time comes when our people can deposit their money in banks with the absolute assurance that when it is called for it will be available without question, our people will continue to hoard, and no one can blame them.

In 1930, 1,345 banks suspended operation in this country, with an aggregate of deposits of $864,715,000. One hundred and sixty-one of them were national banks, 26 State institutions with membership in the Federal reserve system, and 1,158 non-Federal reserve. In 1931 there were 2,298 bank failures divided as follows: 409 national, 108 Federal reserve State members, and 1,781 non-Federal reserve.

Mr. Chairman, I can remember when there was supposed to be something sacrosanct about the title "national bank." The people of this country had been educated to believe that somehow and in some way Uncle Sam was back of them. These banks would qualify as Federal depositories and would advertise that fact and thereby the public was led to believe that the resources of the Federal Government guaranteed their stability. But alas, during the last few years this halo has been dissipated and the great American public has been sadly disillusioned. In the face of the revelations of the past few years we now know that the title "national bank" is more or less a misnomer and in many instances has been a hollow mockery. [Applause.]

The Seventy-second Congress has already passed some very beneficial legislation, such as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill, but it has not gone far enough. The $2,000,000,000 refinancing measure has practically stopped bank failures, but the spirit of this legislation has not been carried out. The intent of Congress in passing this measure was to stabilize our banks and at the same time liquefy their assets so that they could extend credit to the business interests of the country. However, it is my information that it is just as difficult to obtain credit from banks—even those enjoying the benefits of this two billion Government loan—to-day as it was before the creation of the Refinancing Corporation. It is openly charged that the greatest hoarders to-day are the banks themselves. It is charged that, with their vaults bulging with money, they stubbornly refuse to loan even on gilt-edged security. This, my colleagues, is another serious indictment against our present banking system.

Mr. Chairman, I am advised that from the smaller cities and towns throughout the Nation the idea of guaranty of bank deposits is enthusiastically acclaimed, and that the opposition to the proposition comes from the metropolitan centers. This is easily understood, for if deposits in all banks were guaranteed, there would, of course, be no choice as to safety, irrespective of the location of the bank. Money deposited in small cities, towns, and rural sections would be just as safe as money deposited in the large banks of the metropolitan center. Furthermore, any plan of this nature would of necessity diminish the amount of money that is daily being poured into New York, Chicago, and other large cities from the smaller communities. Great chain concerns rarely leave any money on deposit in the communities where they operate, but send it daily or weekly to the metropolitan banks. If all banks enjoyed Government protection to depositors, vast sums of money would remain in the local centers where it originates and where it could be used for the upbuilding of the local communities.

Such measures as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Glass-Steagall Federal reserve bills are beginning to make inroads on the depression, but it can not be denied that they are only of a temporary nature. In talking and corresponding with bankers throughout the Nation, as well as feeling the pulse of the general public, it is the consensus of opinion that nothing short of a governmental guaranty of deposits will completely restore public confidence in the financial structure, on which rests to a large degree the revival of business and the termination of the present depression. Much of the opposition advanced is based upon the belief that if deposits were guaranteed it would cause poor banking, but in my judgment it would have the opposite effect. I am of the opinion that a Federal banking commission, functioning along the lines of the Interstate Commerce Commission, could beyond question control weak or unsound banking methods.

The Federal reserve banks, as you know, are owned entirely by the member banks, and I feel quite sure that the member banks would be perfectly willing to forego the small 6 per cent dividend they receive on their stock and permit this money to be set up in a guaranty fund. Furthermore, I believe the banks, as sole owners of the Federal reserve system, should have some voice as to what disposition is made of the balance of the earning. Under our present system all earnings now in excess of dividend and surplus requirements are paid over to the Government as an excise tax. Since 1913 and including 1930 the Federal reserve banks have paid out in dividends $275,136,225, and after dividends to stockholders and contributions to surplus have been made during that period $147,126,822 has been paid to the Government, making a total of $422,263,047 that could have been allocated to a guaranty fund. Had this been done, it would have more than paid all of the losses sustained by depositors in member banks.

I am advised by the American Bankers Association, of New York City, that 61.6 per cent of loans and 61 per cent of deposits are in member banks of the Federal reserve system and 38 per cent of loans and 39 per cent of deposits in nonmember banks. Comptroller Pole, at hearings before the House Committee on Banking and Currency, stated that in 815 national banks, which had been liquidated since 1865, general creditors were paid 70 per cent, and that if preferred and secured claims were included, the average was 79 per cent. You can easily see that, after all, the ultimate loss by depositors in insolvent banks is really small compared to losses sustained in any other kind of business.

In a rather lengthy communication from Hon. Newton D. Baker to a correspondent of mine the former Cabinet officer says:

> My own feeling has for a long time been that the first step in this matter must be to require all banks in the country to become members of the Federal reserve system. Mr. Collins, of Washington, whom you, perhaps, know, has recently examined the legal aspects of the suggestion and finds adequate power in the Federal Government under the Constitution to make such a requirement. If that can be done I have no doubt that it would be possible to erect out of the earnings of the system by some process such as you have worked out a fund which would be a sufficient cushion to start the general project of guaranteeing deposits, and I can think of nothing more stabilizing or just than to have a banking system in which the depositor felt that he was as secure as the Government itself.

I believe it would be unfair and would probably invoke much opposition from State banking institutions everywhere to discriminate in any guaranty fund between national and State banks. It occurs to me that it would be a simple process to compel by act of Congress all banks of deposit to become members of the Federal reserve system, and thereby not interfere with the dual system of banking under which we now operate. This plan would not greatly interfere with the individual freedom of banks in the conduct of their business, but would bring them all under one central system required by a few amendments to the Federal reserve act.

I am of the opinion that with a Federal banking commission, properly selected and composed of trained men, including lawyers, bankers, and probably others, unsound banking could be controlled. Unfortunately, the Comptroller of the Currency has little or no power to correct unsound banking. His examiners can only criticize. If the criticisms of the examiners are not respected, the comptroller can only bring suit for the forfeiture of the offending bank's charter, and this would defeat the very purpose of his office in keeping banks open, providing no protection for depositors.

It is my thought that the Federal banking commission should have power to issue bonds, guaranteed by the United States Government, the proceeds of which to be used to pay depositors of insolvent banks in full as soon as claims are proven. These bonds should be marketed at a low rate of interest, and the interest collected on assets of insolvent banks would be sufficient to pay the interest on the bonds. They should be short-time issues, callable by lot; and as the assets of insolvent banks are converted into cash the bonds could be accordingly extinguished. On the closing of a trust of an insolvent bank, the remaining bonds could be called out of the assets collected. Any deficit would be available out of the guarantee fund.

It is also my thought that in any legislation of this nature it would likewise be well to correct some of the weaknesses of the past in the operation of banks by fixing rates of dividends. No doubt many banks now suspended would be open had they, over a period of years, built up their surplus fund instead of paying out a large part of their earnings in dividends. The capital structure should control the rate of dividend; that is to say, no dividend should be paid by member banks until their surplus shall equal at least one-fourth of their capital, and the maximum dividend to be paid by a bank whose surplus shall equal one-fourth and less than one-half of its capital should be limited to 6 per cent per annum. When the surplus shall equal one-half of its capital, the maximum dividend should not be more than 8 per cent. In cases where the surplus is equal to or exceeds the capital, the dividend rate might be discretionary. This principle is embodied in the measure under consideration.

It is my idea, Mr. Chairman, that banks operating on other people's money should not attempt to pay large dividends to their shareholders; that a reasonable dividend should be paid when earned. Sound banking requires an objective of strength and protection for depositors by a consistently increasing surplus.

The profits in the banking business are derived from the use of the people's money. If the profits of the banking business were confined to the earnings of the invested capital, banking would be a very unattractive business indeed. The fact that more than 8,000 banks in the United States have become insolvent and closed their doors during the past 10 years, jeopardizing more than $2,000,000,000 of the people's money, certainly affords sufficient warrant for such legislation as is proposed in this bill.

Chairman STEAGALL of the Banking and Currency Committee, on page 5 of the hearings, epitomizes the argument for this legislation in the following language:

> We must not fail to safeguard the Nation against a repetition of the disasters and distress resulting from bank failures during the past 10 years. It has brought ruin to banks, suffering to depositors, distress to the public, and destruction to business. The principle is accepted as sound on every hand by the Government, by the public, and by the banks themselves. The Government demands insurance when its funds are intrusted to a bank. Banks require bonds of employees for protection against dishonesty. The public invests in life insurance, in fire insurance, in the insurance of crops. Citizens insure themselves against their own negligence. Banks constantly protect particular deposits when such protection is required. Common sense and simple fairness suggest that the public at large be accorded the same consideration.

Mr. Chairman, I have consumed quite enough of the time of the House in this discussion. A number of bills on this subject have been presented to the Senate and the House, one of which was introduced by me. I take it that the bill before us is more or less of a composite of the best that is in these various proposals. A number of the suggestions contained in my bill are embraced in the measure before us. I would like to call your attention to another bill which I have introduced providing protection for banks which is now pending before the Banking and Currency Committee. This bill would make it unlawful, with a good stiff penalty for any person to utter or circulate false reports as to the solvency of a banking institution, that is, reports calculated to destroy confidence in such institutions and thereby precipitate a "run" on same.

The man that will do this deliberately and with premeditation is about the lowest form of animal life in my opinion. I could only compare him to this miserable creature Curtis, of Norfolk, Va., who attempted to capitalize the ghastly Lindbergh tragedy in a ghoulish effort to exploit his silly vanity. From information received by me I am satisfied that a large number of banks have been forced to suspend during this terrible period of depression due to false and malicious gossip and propaganda.

Mr. Chairman, of course the measure before us, being the initial step in Federal bank guaranty, is not 100 per cent perfect. Absolute perfection and infallibility should not be expected. But let us pass it and enter upon an experiment, which I predict will mean one of the greatest reforms that has ever been inaugurated to promote the welfare, happiness, and contentment of our people. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN]. [Applause.]

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, the title to this bill is "A bill to amend the national banking act and Federal reserve act, and to provide a guaranty fund for deposits in banks."

In my judgment, the title to this bill would more correctly disclose the contents of the bill if it were titled "An act to provide a guaranty fund for deposits in a part of the banks of the United States and to force the remainder of the banks into insolvency."

I believe that this bill in its present form, if enacted into law, will be the death warrant for the State banks of the United States and will bring immeasurable chaos and disaster to thousands of small and local banks of the country.

A law providing for a sound guaranty of deposits in banks is something which is much desired but most difficult to obtain. In prosperous times it may be possible for the banking structure of this country to work out a sound guaranty fund. There can be no sound or just guaranty fund which does not include every State and National bank.

The bill which is now before the Congress provides that for the deposits in a bank to be protected by the guaranty fund provided in the bill the bank must be one of three classes: First, it must be a member of the Federal reserve system; second, if not a member of the Federal reserve system, it must pass an examination which is prescribed by the board administering this fund; and third, it must have a capital and surplus of $25,000 or more.

These provisions disclose clearly that the intent and purpose of this act are to force every bank of the United States to become a member of the Federal reserve. When Congress creates a condition which forces every bank in the United States to be a member of the Federal reserve, then it would be far more honest for the Congress openly to state that it is the purpose of the Congress of the United States to destroy the State banking system and to compel every bank in the United States to be a national bank, under the direct control of the National Government. This is a violent invasion upon the sovereignty of the States. A sovereign power which can not control its own banking system is not worthy of the name and is no longer a sovereign power.

It is true that in section 208 this bill provides that a State bank subject to the approval of the board administering this fund can participate in this fund. However, this same section of this bill viciously belied this overture to the State banks. This is because in section 208 of this bill it is provided that such nonmember banks shall pay an initial contribution and an annual contribution in a sum which is twice as much as the contributions paid by member banks.

In section 202 of this bill it is provided that the Treasury of the United States shall make an advancement to this guaranty fund, each of the Federal reserve banks shall make an advancement to the guaranty fund, and each of the banks participating shall make an advancement to the fund. If we enact this bill into law, then we have provided that the Treasury of the United States, the Federal reserve banks, and the member banks have formed a gigantic conspiracy fund for the purpose of giving special privilege to the member banks and to destroy the outside banks.

With the deposits in member banks guaranteed by such a fund, it is obvious that the people of the United States will transfer their deposits from banks not participating in this guaranty fund to banks which are participating in this guaranty fund. This is such a vicious conspiracy in restraint of trade that if any other line of business in the United States would undertake to carry on a similar program it would be haled into court for creating an unlawful combination and conspiracy in restraint of trade. It would be facing dissolution and its officers facing the penitentiary.

When nonmember banks of the Federal reserve find their deposits slipping away from them into the member banks, as the case will be, if this bill is enacted into law, they will find that they will be compelled either to watch their institutions go into insolvency or be blackmailed into joining this association of guaranty banks to which they would be compelled by law to pay an annual contribution twice the amount paid by the privileged member banks.

Every Member of this Congress who votes for this bill is literally taking his hammer in hand, filling his pockets with nails, and nailing shut the doors of the State banks of America. It may be that Congress can not keep open all of the banks of this country. That is something which is beyond our control; but, if we pass this bill, the economic distress and human despair which will follow in the wake of the closing of thousands of State banks will be upon our hands. We shall be the ones who are directly responsible for it. Simply because we may not have the prescription in our medicine chest which will cure the patient which is upon our hands, that is no justification for administering strychnine to our patient.

In these times of distress it is common knowledge that there are thousands of banks in our country which can not pass the entrance requirements of the Federal reserve system.

This is no reflection upon these outside banks. Due to the same conditions, there are many banks that are in the Federal reserve system which are at this time in no position to meet the requirements for entrance. Yet under this bill the banks that are already in the Federal reserve system can participate in this fund, while equally as sound banks outside of the system can not participate in the fund. It is true that under section 208 the nonmember banks that desire to participate in this guaranty fund must pass an examination by the board administering this guaranty fund rather than the Federal Reserve Board; however, it is obvious that the board administering this fund would of necessity prescribe an examination of equal rigidity as the examination for entrance into the Federal reserve system. If the board does not prescribe such an examination, it would be practicing a fraud upon the banks which are members of the Federal reserve system. It would be most dishonest for the board to permit weak banks to come into this fund and participate on equal terms and conditions with banks that are now members of the Federal reserve.

In this connection I have a telegram from the Hon. H. W. Koeneke, bank commissioner of the State of Kansas. It is as follows:

Six hundred and forty-seven State banks and fifteen trust companies operating under Kansas charters. Five State banks are members of the Federal reserve system. Two hundred and ten State banks do not have sufficient capital to be eligible for membership; many would not be able to qualify at this time. It seems to me that the national bank guaranty law would have the exact opposite effect on Kansas banks than is the intention of the act. Your aggressive opposition appreciated.

H. W. KOENEKE,
Bank Commissioner.

Here we find that in the State of Kansas, out of 662 State banks and trust companies, 5 of them are members of the Federal reserve system. Therefore only 5 of the 662 State banking institutions of Kansas would be eligible to participate in the guaranty fund provided by this act without at least paying an annual contribution of twice as much as the assessment against the member banks. Two hundred and ten of the State banks of Kansas, even though they were disposed to stand for this 100 per cent discrimination in assessments, would still be ineligible under this act, because they do not have a capital and surplus of $25,000. Many of the remainder of these State banks could not at this time meet the requirements, notwithstanding the fact that they are equally as sound as many of the banks which are now members of the Federal reserve.

There may be those who have become so enamored with great national and international banking that they regard it as a matter of small concern as to whether or not these smaller State banks survive or perish. If these small banks are driven out of business, it means the death knell of banking credit for the individual and small business. Banking credit for the individual and small business made this a great country. During the some one hundred and fifty years' existence of this Republic, hundreds and thousands of men obtained a few hundred dollars of credit when their principal collateral was their character and integrity, and from that credit they developed into successful business men. They built the small communities of this Nation. It was men such as these who started the small institutions which grew into larger institutions; and as their institutions grew, country towns and villages grew into great industrial centers. It was the smaller banks which advanced such credit. The great banks did not advance it. Banks with large deposits are not interested in loans of a few hundred dollars.

When this country becomes so selfish and avaricious that it is only interested in credit for the great and powerful the old America which we know is bound to perish. I am not opposed to great banks for great credit, but great banks and great credit must leave a place in American life for small banks and small credit. I can understand how great banks and great credit in their wild and mad rush for wealth may ruthlessly destroy small banks and small credit but it is beyond my comprehension that Congressmen and Senators, representatives of the people, would ever enact legislation which overnight would more completely destroy small banks and small credit than any program which great wealth could ever establish.

In my own district there are 32 banks which are members of the Federal reserve system and 43 which are nonmembers. If I can help it, this Congress is not going to enact a bill that will overnight drive the deposits out of those 43 nonmember banks into the 32 member banks. If I can help it, we are not going to destroy the majority of the banks in the district which I represent. In my judgment, any Member of this Congress who votes for this bill betrays the interest of the majority of his constituents and drives thousands into bankruptcy. When these deposits are driven out of these nonmember banks into the member banks the nonmember banks are forced to liquidate. When they are forced to liquidate that means that those who owe them money are in turn forced to liquidate. Immediate liquidation at this time will mean a sheriff's sale for the people who owe these nonmember banks. The interest of the stockholders in these nonmember banks is small as compared with the anguish and the despair which will fall upon their debtors who are forced to make an immediate liquidation.

I can not conceive how this Congress could perpetrate and inflict more cruelty upon a greater number of people than to enact a law which will inevitably drive into insolvency the great majority of the banks of this country that are not members of the Federal reserve system.

The fund provided by this bill which is to guarantee the deposits of certain banks is one-half billion dollars. This guaranty fund is confined practically exclusively to the deposits in national banks. As of June 30, 1931, the last available statistics which I have at hand, the total bank deposits of the United States were, in round figures, $54,000,000,000. These deposits, in round figures, were divided as follows:

State banks and trust companies	$21,000,000,000
National banks	22,000,000,000
Savings banks	11,000,000,000

This guaranty fund of one-half billion dollars is to guarantee $22,000,000,000 of deposits in the national banks. It seems to me but a silly fancy and a childish dream to suggest that one-half billion dollars can guarantee the $22,000,000,000 of deposits in the national banks. This means that $1 stands as a guaranty for the safety of $44. It is my judgment that this effort to guarantee $22,000,000,000 of national-bank deposits with a one-half billion dollar guaranty fund will turn out to be a humbug and a fraud upon the American people, just as every State bank guaranty law has turned out to be a fraud upon the depositors in State banks. It seems obvious to me that the enactment of this law, providing for a one-half billion dollar fund to guarantee $22,000,000,000 of national-bank deposits, will prove to be a failure. I am quite certain that the enactment of this law, which proposes to guarantee only the deposits of national banks, will cause chaos and pandemonium in the $32,000,000,000 of deposits in the State banks and trust companies and in the savings banks. Any bank guaranty law which does not actually and honestly provide equal protection for the entire $54,000,000,000 of bank deposits is an iniquity and a fraud practiced upon the American people, which, above all, should not be inflicted by the Congress of the United States.

Let us not lend the sanctity of the faith and the integrity of the Government of the United States to any bank guarantee law which will not adequately protect the deposits of every bank in the United States. If it is impossible for us to provide a guarantee fund which is adequate and substantial enough actually to protect the bank deposits which are secured, and to grant equal protection to the deposits of every bank in the United States, then let us leave it alone. Dreams and panaceas can not cure our present ills. Partiality and special privilege as between banking institutions and as between depositors are iniquities which this Government must not practice if we expect to survive and retain the confidence of our citizens.

If we enact this law then within a few years there will be no banks in this country except banks which are members of the Federal reserve system. When that happens, every small country national bank of this country will be but a gathering agency and sort of a subsidiary for the large banks. We can view the matter in the most charitable light, and we can not escape realizing that during the last 10 years the national banking department and the Federal reserve system have been used to destroy local and individual credit. We can not escape the knowledge that the national banking department and the Federal reserve system have been used for the benefit of large banks and to the detriment of the small member banks.

The national-bank examiners went into these small national banks and laid down the rule that paper which was not liquidated at frequent intervals was bad paper. These examiners compelled the local bankers to charge off paper which was not liquidated at frequent intervals. The management of these small national banks were not permitted to run their own institutions. They soon found that they could not give credit to their neighbors and local citizens. They were compelled to discontinue credit for customers who had dealt with these local banks for the years and upon which the banks had never lost a dollar.

These local national banks soon found that the only paper which they could have in their possession which would meet the approval of these examiners was a note secured by a certificate of stock in some corporation which was listed on the board of trade. This destroyed and denied credit for sound and legitimate local business. It furnished credit for stock gambling. With credit taken away from local and legitimate business, it was deflated. With credit given over to gambling, gambling was inflated. This is one of the principal reasons for the wild stock inflation which came to an end in 1929. These local national bankers also found that there were other securities which they could hold which met with the approval of these examiners. That other credit was bonds of foreign countries. International bankers floated these foreign issues, took their handsome commissions, and forced the bonds on to the local banks. Now we find the banks of this country loaded down with a lot of foreign loans which were floated by big banks. The Federal reserve system did not prevent this situation; on the contrary, it is obvious that it encouraged it.

The Federal reserve law was enacted with the supposed purpose of taking the banking business of this country out of the control of the big banks. The truth is, it turned it over to them. The large banking institutions have been able to use the Federal reserve system and to monopolize the banking and credit of this country to a far greater extent than they could ever have done without it. This is due to the fact that the law permits the membership of the Federal Reserve Board to be composed entirely of bankers. In the nature of things, this board, composed entirely of bankers, has been composed of men whose viewpoint is that of great banking and of great credit with no regard for small banking and small credit.

As a matter of fact, their viewpoint has been one of contempt for small banking and small credit. It is obvious that the Federal reserve system has been operated in the interest of the lender of money and with no fair regard for the borrower of money. Human nature would permit no other course, when the board which controls the Federal reserve system is composed of those whose training is along the lines of great international and national banking rather than along the lines of local banking and local credit. Until such time as the borrowers of money are represented on the Federal Reserve Board along with the lenders of money, the Federal reserve system of this country will be a curse to local and individual credit rather than a benefit. A fair regard for the welfare of local banking, whether it be National or State banks and individual credit, requires that the entire banking structure of this country must not be controlled by the Federal reserve system, an instrumentality of the National Government.

We talk about centralized wealth being a menace to the welfare of the people, yet the truth is it is a lesser menace to the liberty and welfare of the people than centralized government. As a matter of fact, centralized wealth could never reach such a menacing proportion except that we have centralized government. However, if we have centralized wealth, we are bound to have centralized government. When Congress drives all of the banks into the Federal reserve system, an agency of the National Government, it has taken the longest possible step toward centralized wealth and centralized government. The State banking system of this country is the last bulwark between the people and centralized wealth and government. The State banking system must not be destroyed. This bill will destroy the State banking system. It must not be passed. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman says State banks could not become members of the Federal reserve bank. The gentleman has not considered the fact that they can become members of this fund if they have $25,000 of capital and surplus and a certificate of good health from the State banking department.

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes; for three years' time; and at the end of the three years you force every State bank in this country to be at the mercy and under the domination of this board.

Mr. STEVENSON. It requires them to submit to an examination, the same as any other bank.

Mr. McGUGIN. Why do you not in this bill make it for all time? Why do you not provide that for three years State banks participating in this fund need no further credentials than from their own State banking department? Why not make it any unlimited period instead of three years, enough time to fish them into the system?

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. KELLER. I would like to know whom we are trying to help through this bill—the people who are going to put money into the banks or the banks primarily?

Mr. McGUGIN. The main point is this, as I view it: You can not set up a fund which guarantees about 40 per cent of the deposits of this country without spreading chaos and pandemonium among the other 60 per cent.

Mr. KELLER. If there are objections to the bill, why not propose amendments to the bill that will make it possible for these State banks to come in?

Mr. McGUGIN. I take it that the reason the committee backed off from the State banks is because there are so many of them that it was feared that they would break down the entire guaranty fund.

Mr. KELLER. I do not think so. I have many letters from my State banks. What I am trying to get at is this: The bankers of this country, both National and State, have had things to suit themselves for all these years, and as far as I know they have never made any provision for the protection of the people of this country when they put their money in the hands of those bankers. Have they or not?

Mr. McGUGIN. I can not answer as to the past conduct of all the banks of the country.

Mr. KELLER. Well, have they or have they not? Why have they not done it?

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. I wish to ask the gentleman if this is not the effect of this bill: That we are taking $150,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States and constituting it a guaranty fund to be added to by a further liability on the part of the United States in case it is needed, and that thereby we guarantee only a limited number of banks in which depositors have deposited their money? Is not this the effect of it?

Mr. McGUGIN. That is my understanding of the effect of it; yes; with the exception of one part of the gentleman's question. The gentleman said we are taking $150,000,000 out of the Treasury. That is true. Then the gentleman said there was a further liability. I can not answer as to that part which pertains to a further liability.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. STEAGALL. There is not any liability whatever touching the Treasury of the United States, except the $150,000,000 which is taken out of the Treasury for the purpose of starting the initial guaranty fund. We take that because the Federal reserve banks have put that amount into the Treasury.

Mr. TILSON. But it is in the Treasury; and once it is taken out by this bill or through any other means, we shall have to make it good.

Mr. KELLER. If it does not belong to us, we ought to make it good, ought we not?

Mr. TILSON. But it does belong to us.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Referring to the colloquy that has just taken place, the actual amount that under this bill would come from the United States Treasury is $147,126,882. In addition there is $150,000,000 to be taken out of the reserve or surplus of the Federal reserve system, which really belongs to the United States, making a total of $297,000,000.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman yield to me? I am sure the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] does not want to mislead the Members of the House, and certainly there is no foundation for that statement.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman from Kansas yield further to me?

Mr. McGUGIN. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL], the chairman of the committee, has questioned my statement about the withdrawal of $150,000,000 of surplus from the Federal reserve system.

Mr. STEAGALL. No; I do not question that statement, so long as it is put in that language.

Mr. McFADDEN. Just what was the objection to the statement then?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. That it belongs to the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. May I say that the law provides that in case of liquidation of the Federal reserve system the surplus of the Federal reserve system belongs to the United States Treasury.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. In case of liquidation, yes; but this is anything but liquidation. This is giving the member banks the benefit of their own reserve and surplus.

Mr. McFADDEN. This is not their own reserve. The banks have nothing in the world to do with it. It can not be distributed to them in any way. The only distribution of this surplus must go to the United States and not to the member banks of the reserve system.

Mr. McGUGIN. I may say to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LaGUARDIA] that that statement does not apply to the $150,000,000 that the Government is actually putting up and contributing to this fund.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CABLE].

Mr. CABLE. Mr. Chairman, there were 30,800 banks in the United States in 1921. To-day there are approximately 20,200. Banks that failed or suspended payment between 1921 and 1932 number 7,000. Neither weakness in banking structure nor lack of competent management can be blamed entirely for these failures; depression in agriculture, flight of profitable business to larger cities (attended by heavy withdrawals), accumulation of worthless paper, and the establishment of too many banks for the population in the area served are some of the reasons for these failures. A large percentage of the failed banks had capital of $25,000 or less, or were located in towns of 5,000 or less. The sudden collapse in the stock market was not the sole cause of bank failures; many occurred before that time. It did, however, have a staggering effect on business, which threw a heavy burden on the banks.

In the spring of 1931 fear of impending disaster caused individuals to withdraw their currency from the banks. The postal savings increased from a balance of $175,271,686 as of June 30, 1930, to $347,416,870 as of June 30, 1931. On April 30, 1932, the balance in postal savings to the credit of depositors was $713,866,528. The number of depositors in postal savings has increased to more than 1,250,000. Because of lack of confidence in any institutions, $1,250,000,000 additional went into hiding, in safe-deposit boxes, in the ground, and elsewhere.

Faced with this situation and the fear of sudden demand by depositors, the banks of the country refused to make further loans and began to liquidate. In October, 1931, we had a bank panic; 522 banks were closed during that month. In November 175 were closed; in December, 358; in January, 1932, 342 banks were closed. Failures in 1931 amounted to 2,290 banks, with deposits of $1,759,000,000. Of these failures, 410 were national banks and 108 were State banks which were members of the Federal reserve system. The money tied up in closed banks during 1931 was but $30,000,000 less than the total amount of money tied up in closed banks during the whole of the preceding nine years.

RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION BRINGS ABOUT A DECLINE IN BANK FAILURES

To restore confidence, stop hoarding, prevent bank failures, and to provide emergency financial facilities for financial institutions, Congress passed the act creating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. This was approved by the President and became a law on January 22, 1932.

This law authorized loans to be made upon approved security to banks, trust companies, building and loan associations, insurance companies, mortgage-loan companies, joint-stock land banks, livestock credit companies, agricultural credit corporations, and railroads. Charles G. Dawes was named president of the corporation. Eugene Meyer, governor of the Federal Reserve Board, was named chairman. The directors include Ogden L. Mills, Secretary of the Treasury.

By February 2, 1932, the corporation began to function. On March 31, 1932, loans had been made, fully and adequately secured, in an amount of more than $238,000,000. Of this sum, $158,182,242.06 went to banks and trust companies, of which $2,173,000 were used to aid in reorganization and liquidation.

By April 19, $243,248,769 had been loaned to 1,520 banks and trust companies, and an additional sum of $17,326,748 had been loaned to 98 building and loan associations; 69.2 per cent of this money went to banks in towns and cities of 5,000 or less; 84.6 per cent went to banks in cities of 25,000 or less, and only 5.3 per cent of the money loaned went to banks in cities of 1,000,000 or more inhabitants. Thus, it is apparent that by far the greatest portion of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation's financial aid to banks, trust companies, and building and loan associations was extended to such institutions in our smaller towns and cities.

The result of the act was to check bank suspensions. In February, 1932, the number of suspensions had been reduced to 122, and 46 banks reopened during that month. In March there were but 45 suspensions and at the same time 28 reopenings. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is not intended as a permanent organization. It is not intended to continue for such a period of time that it can be used to prevent a recurrence of bank failures. The welfare of the people depends to a very great extent upon continuation of our banking institutions. It is of national importance that financial panics should not again occur. If Congress by law can strengthen and stabilize the banking institutions and preserve and maintain the confidence of the people in them, it is the duty of this body to do so.

GUARANTY OF BANK DEPOSITS TO PROTECT DEPOSITORS

My proposed remedy is set forth in a bill—H. R. 11201—which I introduced in the House, providing for the formation of a Federal bank-deposit guaranty and insurance corporation to insure bank deposits. The management was to be independent of the Federal reserve system, and the guaranty fund was to be created by payment of premiums based on the average daily bank deposits balance of each bank.

The House Committee on Banking and Currency has seen fit to report out a different kind of bill, one which nevertheless would, if enacted into law, guarantee bank deposits. The measure now before the House is known as the Steagall bill, and provides a guaranty fund of $517,000,000, without a Treasury appropriation. This fund would be created out of $167,000,000 in franchise taxes paid by banks of the reserve system, $150,000,000 from surpluses now in the hands of the banks, and an assessment of $200,000,000. This fund would be administered by a board to be composed of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Comptroller of the Currency, and three members appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. Authority to liquidate closed banks and pay off depositors in full at any time after a bank is closed would be delegated to this board. An amendment, which, I understand, is acceptable to Chairman STEAGALL, has been proposed to permit all State banks, regardless of the amount of their capital, to enjoy the benefits of the guaranty and insurance features if and when they qualify. Upon payment of an assessment all State banks not members of the Federal reserve system would be permitted to contribute to and participate in the guaranty fund provided by the Steagall bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why not guarantee everybody a living for life?

Mr. CABLE. I am glad the gentleman has asked that question. Some one here has compared the grocery business with the banking business. A bank is a lawful monopoly. Before a bank may be established and operated, the Government, Federal or State, must first give its consent. The men, women, children, and the industries of your home town depend upon the solvency of its banks.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And the gentleman should add that the grocer is dealing with his own goods, whereas the bank is dealing with the money of its depositors.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CABLE. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. The gentleman has made a study of this question, and I would like for the gentleman to tell us why the guaranty of deposits laws have failed in the States where they have been tried.

Mr. CABLE. That question has been raised before, and I am glad to answer the gentleman from Oregon. A State law to guarantee bank deposits confines the burden of expense and security to too small a territory. A crop failure in one State in the past has wiped out the security and destroyed the guaranty system of that State. Oil-stock manipulation in the State of Oklahoma wiped out the securities in its banks. If the burden is spread over the entire United States, a crop failure in the gentleman's own home State of Oregon or an oil-stock manipulation in another State, would not break down the system of guaranteeing bank deposits; there still would be sufficient security in the other States to protect the banks and carry on the business.

Then, too, as is indicated by the hearings before the committee on the bill now under consideration, inefficient examination, lax administration, and indiscriminate granting of charters in States that enacted guaranty laws had much to do with the failure of those guaranty systems.

I quote from the "Business Week," which appears in the Literary Digest of January 2, 1932:

> The fact that it has failed where applied locally proves no more than that it is impossible for a single community alone to insure itself successfully against death or fire. It must, of course, be applied on a national scale so as to spread the risk widely over diverse conditions and be coupled with machinery for enforcing uniform standards of banking practice.
> The risk is easily calculable on an actuarial basis.
> Even in the epidemic conditions of the past 10 years it is so small compared with the total of deposits that the reserve required for protection against actual losses from bank liquidation would be relatively small, and the burden upon the banking system as a whole would be slight.

The committee guaranty bill now before us provides for diversification of risk over the entire country.

THE ALTERNATIVE—A NATIONAL SYSTEM OF BRANCH BANKS

The Comptroller of the Currency, J. W. Pole, when he recently appeared before the House Committee on Banking and Currency, advocated regional branch banks and reminded the committee that, in his opinion, the remedy for the country-bank situation is a system of branch banking built up around strong city banks operating under close Government supervision.

A bill introduced by Senator GLASS is now pending in the United States Senate providing, among other things, for a system of branch national banks. If that provision should become a law, it would give national banks the right within the State of their domicile, as well as in adjoining States within 50 miles of the parent bank, to establish branch banks, irrespective of State laws. In my opinion, this bill should not become law—it would destroy our local banks by forcing them to sell out, become a branch of a national bank, or go out of business.

Mr. Pole and Senator GLASS may have in mind the Canadian system of national branch banks. As a matter of fact, opponents of the proposal to guarantee bank deposits point to Canada. They say, "There have been no bank failures in Canada. Canada has no deposit guaranty system. Let us try the Canadian system."

Compare the American banking situation with the Canadian. In the United States we have two independent systems of banks—the national banks and the State banks. National banks were created to meet national needs only. Later the Federal reserve system was created to stabilize and assure flexibility in those banks which should become members of that system. State banks may by complying with certain requirements become members in full standing with national banks.

Thus we have in this country nearly 20,000 independent banks, each responsive to the needs and interests of the community which it serves.

In Canada, on the other hand, there are 10 large banks, located in as many large cities, with a total of 4,000 branch banks scattered all over the country. One of the 10 Canadian banks has 1,000 branches and holds 27 per cent of Canada's entire commercial banking assets.

The United States and Canada are of approximately equal area, and both have practically the same mineral and other natural resources. The United States, however, has a population twelve times as large as that of Canada, a natural wealth twelve times as great, and an annual income thirteen times as great. Banking problems in the United States consequently are correspondingly more complex.

Branch banking is not the solution or remedy to avoid bank suspensions. The Home National Bank of Canada, for example, with deposits of $15,000,000 suspended payment and failed within the last few years, carrying down with it all of its branch banks. In December, 1930, the Bank of United States in New York suspended payment. It had 58 branches in the city of New York with total deposits of $161,000,000. All of the 58 branches were closed with the parent bank.

Of the 20,000 banks in the United States, upon whom our people are dependent for financial assistance, approximately 18,000 are independent State banks. It is proposed to destroy our dual system of independent banks by authorizing the national banks to establish branch banks throughout the country, without regard to State laws. There thus would be created a single system of banks. In many States branch banking is prohibited. In Ohio, for example, branch banking is prohibited excepting within the municipal limits of the parent bank.

If Senator GLASS's plan or the recommendation of Mr. Pole should become law, the independent State banks would be forced to sell out their independence and their assets to a national bank and become a branch bank of that system. Should such a system of branch banking ever be established, the change would be attended by a destruction of individual initiative and enterprise, which are so essential to good citizenship.

In endeavoring to strengthen our financial institutions, or any of our other institutions, we must not forget that the ultimate strength of our Nation depends upon the strength of a citizenry made up of persons who are individually strong.

If we ever establish a national system of branch banks, those men and women who now are presidents, vice presidents, and cashiers of their own banks would become managers and tellers of branch banks of some large central bank, miles away from the local community, and whose officers have absolutely no personal interest in the welfare and growth of the local community.

Another system of banking is that known as chain banking. In Ohio, for example, as well as in New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania, the State law permits branch banking only in the city of the parent banks. Few States authorize branch banking. Primarily in those States which have no branch-banking laws, but even in those States which have them, individuals or holding corporations acquire the control of a number of independent banks through the purchase of their stock. Banks thus controlled are known as chain banks. They have the same serious effect upon home communities as chain stores. The ownership, control, and interest being foreign, they do not respond to local needs. The funds may be shifted at will by those who control these banks, to the detriment of local communities, just as funds collected by chain stores are taken from small cities and villages and sent to the great money-market centers. Pool operation, or chain operation, as it is called, makes it possible to raise interest rates in one community above a profitable level. When a monopoly is created, the interest rates are lowered again. Such cut-throat competition destroys or weakens independent local banks.

The people of the United States are confronted with an emergency as serious as war. Misery is widespread. Most Members of the House have seen suffering and distressed bank depositors—the destruction of their business and the loss of their homes. Thousands have been reduced to poverty and despair. Life savings, security for old age, have dwindled to almost nothing. To a great extent all this is the result of bank failures. The length and severity of the depression have been due principally to the closing of many banks and the inability of others to function normally. Our concern is the continued solvency of the banks of our communities, because we are interested chiefly in the future welfare of bank depositors.

I quote Henry M. Dawes, former Comptroller of the Currency, who stated at a hearing before the House Committee on Banking and Currency:

> The man who knows his customers and who lives in the midst of their environment is infinitely more competent to handle their funds than the most technically proficient banker in New York. In branch banking, character loans are impossible. The development of America is dependent on nothing else than on the independent-unit bankers of vision, courage and independence, whose first interest in the creditor is his character.

Neither branch banking nor chain banking will remedy the situation. The solution is the insurance or guaranty of bank deposits. That will restore confidence and aid materially in bringing us out of the depression.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOODRUM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11362 and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted—

To Mrs. NORTON, for the remainder of the week, on account of illness.

To Mr. CROWTHER, for one day, on account of important business.

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER. The Chair designates the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] to preside at the session to-night.

PROCEEDINGS AT UNVEILING OF STATUE OF CHARLES BRANTLEY AYCOCK

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I send up a privileged resolution, House Concurrent Resolution 31, for present consideration.

House Concurrent Resolution 31

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That there be printed with illustrations and bound 5,000 copies of the proceedings in Congress, together with the proceedings held at the unveiling in Statuary Hall, upon the acceptance of the statue of Charles Brantley Aycock, presented by the State of North Carolina, of which 1,000 copies shall be for the Senate and 2,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and the remaining 1,500 copies shall be for the use and distribution of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of North Carolina.

The Joint Committee on Printing is hereby authorized to have the copy prepared for the Public Printer and shall procure suitable illustrations to be published with these proceedings.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is this the customary allotment?

Mr. STEVENSON. Yes; this is the customary resolution and allotment, except that formerly it was the habit to print 20,000. We have recently cut that down to 5,000.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-night it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. There are some very important committee hearings going on, and I feel constrained to object.

Mr. STEAGALL. We want to use the time in general debate.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is very true; but frequently when we do come at 11 o'clock, some one makes the point of no quorum, and no advantage is had. I object.

EXTENSION OF TIME FOR GENERAL DEBATE

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate upon the pending bill be extended for one hour, to be equally divided between the gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself, the debate to be confined to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INVESTIGATION OF GOVERNMENT COMPETITION

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House Resolution 235, which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Let the resolution be reported.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 235

Resolved, That the Speaker of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a special committee to be composed of five members for the purpose of investigating Government competition with private enterprise and all other questions in relation thereto that would aid the Congress in any necessary remedial legislation. The committee shall report to the House not later than December 15, 1932, the result of its investigation, together with such recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable.

That said special committee or any subcommittee thereof is authorized to sit and act at such times and places within the United States, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to employ such experts, and such clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, by subpœna or otherwise, to take such testimony, to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures as it deems necessary, and such expenses thereof shall be paid on vouchers ordered by said committee and approved by the chairman thereof. Subpœnas shall be issued under the signature of the chairman and shall be served by any person designated by him. The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses. Every person who, having been summoned as a witness by authority of said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the investigation heretofore authorized, shall be held to the penalties provided by section 102 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Has any estimate been made as to the cost of this peregrinating committee?

Mr. COX. It will cost a minimum sum, not very much. It is believed that the entire investigation may be conducted here in the city of Washington.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know what it is that is being investigated.

Mr. COX. It is the question of competition as between Government and private enterprise—in other words, the Government engaging in the mercantile business and the restaurant business and in every form of business.

Mr. STAFFORD. The majority of this Congress is on record as favoring the manufacture of fertilizers at Muscle Shoals. What is the use of investigating minor manufacturing?

The SPEAKER. The Chair was informed that this came as a unanimous report from the Committee on Rules, and the gentlemen in charge on each side were in favor of the resolution. Otherwise the Chair would not have recognized the gentleman to take it up at the hour.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I think it will be interesting to have some statement from the gentleman from Georgia as to just what investigation this resolution contemplates. It is very broad in its terms. What is the specific thing that the proponents of the resolution have in mind to investigate?

Mr. COX. The resolution is intended to set up a committee to deal with the question of the Government competing with private individuals in the restaurant business, in the laundry business, and every other form of business. In other words, the Government, ostensibly for the benefit of employees, establishes a restaurant in one of the buildings, which the public within that vicinity patronizes.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, to end the argument, I object.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up the resolution, House Resolution 235, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia calls up a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia makes a point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to withdraw the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks leave to withdraw his request to call up the resolution.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order of no quorum.

RECESS

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now recess until 8 o'clock to-night.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, pursuant to its previous order, the House recessed until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION

The recess having expired at 8 o'clock p. m., the House was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. RAINEY.

PRIVATE CALENDAR

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under unanimous-consent agreement heretofore entered into, the House is in session until 10.30 o'clock p. m. for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar under the old rule, commencing at the last starred bill where the call left on April 26 last. The present occupant of the Chair desires again to suggest, as he did on the 26th day of April, that if Members objecting to bills would make their objections and not reserve them, and if proponents of bills who desire to present their case would extend their remarks in the RECORD, it might be possible to call more bills.

On April 26 there were 495 bills on the Private Calendar from the point where we left off. Now there are 686 bills on the Private Calendar. This calendar grows faster than we can dispose of bills on it.

The Chair is powerless to carry into effect these suggestions but can do it with the cooperation of the Members present, and it might not be impossible to call as many as a hundred bills in a night.

Members who fail to get their bills considered are likely to meet with some objections when they get home. Questions will be asked as to their efficiency; yet Members are perfectly powerless in the matter. If we can call as many as a hundred bills to-night, the Chair will cooperate and do the best he can to get sessions, either night sessions or day sessions, during the remainder of this session to complete the entire Private Calendar and call all unobjected-to bills.

The Clerk will call the first bill.

WILL A. HELMER

The Clerk called the first bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 1448, for the relief of Will A. Helmer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, when the House was last considering Private Calendar bills unobjected to there was a reservation of objection to this bill, and the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. HOOPER, had the floor.

Since that time I have examined the report again, out of courtesy to the gentleman. I believe he wishes to make a brief explanation, and I yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, I shall not take the time of the House, in view of what the Speaker pro tempore has said, to make an explanation.

The gentleman from Wisconsin has said he intended to object to it. I wish to make the statement that I feel this is a meritorious bill. The War Department has reported on it, and I hope the gentleman will go fully into the facts.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will be pleased to cooperate with the gentleman as to matters referred to in the report of the Secretary of War and see whether the burden is upon the Government or upon the Michigan Central Railroad. I am of the opinion it is an obligation of the Michigan Central Railroad and not of the Government.

I object, Mr. Speaker.

JOSEPH C. GRISSOM

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1668, to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of Joseph C. Grissom.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MANLOVE. Will the gentleman from Wisconsin withhold his objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I shall be pleased to withhold it.

Mr. MANLOVE. I wish to make an explanation that probably does not appear on the face of the original report on this bill. I will ask the gentleman if he has the supplemental report?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have, and I have read it very carefully.

Mr. MANLOVE. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin to the fact that I consider this one of the most meritorious bills that have ever been on this calendar.

This is a bill which calls for the payment of a man who was commissioned by the Governor of Indiana a second lieutenant, and who served in that capacity for a year, and did the work of a second lieutenant.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANLOVE. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. The records of the War Department, not of the adjutant general's office of the State of Indiana, but of the War Department, show that he was never mustered in as second lieutenant during the period referred to; that he could not be mustered in as second lieutenant because there were not a sufficient number of men in the company. Further, he was a sergeant. There are any number of instances of similar purport. If we recognize the claim of this man, we will have to recognize the claims of the others.

Mr. MANLOVE. May I ask the gentleman if he believes it is proper or right for the Government of the United States to withhold payment to one person simply because there are other meritorious claims that have not been made?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is a principle of the Army that whenever a company has not sufficient personnel to warrant the granting of a commission and the man is acting in another capacity, although he is doing the work of a higher rank, he draws the pay of the rank in which he is serving.

Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MANLOVE. If the gentleman from Wisconsin will yield——

Mr. PARKS. May I say to the gentleman from Missouri that if the gentleman from Wisconsin is going to object, why waste time in further explanation?

I would not interfere with anybody's bill for anything.

Mr. MANLOVE. I would not interfere with anybody's bill myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard. The Clerk will call the next bill.

E. C. SAMPSON

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4149, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to pay E. C. Sampson, of Billings, Mont., for services rendered the Crow Tribe of Indians.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

Mr. BLANTON. No; I did not object; I reserved the right to object. I wish to make a statement to the gentleman from Montana. While this bill involves only $600, it establishes a bad precedent by paying so-called expert witnesses.

In my State we have gotten to the point where you can not subpœna a doctor to come and testify in a case, like the ordinary witness, unless you pay him something or else have the court force him to attend. He wants $25 a day to testify as a physician. If you summon an engineer he will not come to court unless the court makes him or else you put up $25 a day or $50 or $100 a day. I am against that sort of practice. Whenever a witness is needed in court he ought to be subpœnaed or his deposition ought to be taken, and he ought to be treated exactly like every other witness who comes into court. Mr. Speaker, I object.

RELINQUISHMENT BY THE UNITED STATES OF CERTAIN LANDS TO THE CITY OF COEUR D'ALENE, STATE OF IDAHO

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1133, to provide for the relinquishment by the United States of certain lands to the city of Coeur d'Alene, in the county of Kootenai, in the State of Idaho.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the United States relinquish unto the city of Coeur d'Alene, in the county of Kootenai, in the State of Idaho, all of its right, claim, or title to or the possession of all that part of the Fort Sherman Military Reserve (now abandoned) in section 14, township 50 north, range 4 west, Boise meridian, described as follows: Commencing at the southeast corner of the Fort Sherman Military Reserve (now abandoned) in section 14, township 50 north, range 4 west, Boise meridian; thence running northwesterly in a direct line, making a northwesterly included angle of 84 degrees, 33 minutes with the east limit of said Fort Sherman Military Reserve, a distance of 661.6 feet more or less to the boundary between lots 48 and 49 of said Fort Sherman Military Reserve and the true place of beginning; thence northerly along said boundary 531.76 feet more or less to a point distant 100 feet measured at right angles southwesterly from the center line of the main track of the Spokane, Coeur d'Alene and Palouse Railway Co.; thence angle 150 degrees, 31 minutes to the right and running southeasterly a distance of 617.6 feet; thence angle 120 degrees, 37 minutes to the right and running westerly 304.1 feet more or less to the true place of beginning; containing 1.88 acres more or less, situate in Kootenai County, Idaho.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

WILLIAM ALEXANDER KEYS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2707, for the relief of William Alexander Keys.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States is authorized and directed to pay to William Alexander Keys, of Brockway, Pa., the sum of $845 in repayment of purchase money paid by him on a portion of mineral entry 046436, Los Angeles, Calif., receipt No. 2983484, and which repayment is authorized by the provisions of the act of March 26, 1908 (35 Stat. 48), as amended by the act of December 11, 1929 (41 Stat. 366), and was recommended by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, approved by the Secretary of the Interior, and disallowed by the Comptroller General of the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment. In line 10, strike out "1929" and insert "1919."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: On page 1, in line 10, strike out the figures "1929" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "1919."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer this amendment in view of the recommendation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, as found in his report, in which he calls attention to the fact that the date should be 1919 and not 1929. I am relying entirely upon the recommendation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

MARGARET DIEDERICH

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 954, for the relief of Margaret Diederich.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have some explanation of this bill. It is for the relief of one Margaret Diederich, whose husband was a consular officer and who died two years after retirement. It is now recommended that we pay his widow one year's salary.

Mr. SCHAFER. I will be glad to give the gentleman an explanation. This bill was reported last Congress by the Foreign Affairs Committee in an omnibus bill, together with a number of other bills of a similar nature. It had the favorable recommendation of the State Department. Mr. Diederich was the American consul general at Antwerp, Belgium, at the outbreak of the World War. By reason of the extraordinary duties placed upon him in 1914 he broke down physically and mentally and his family lost practically all of their personal effects at the time of the German invasion.

The arduous duties placed upon the American consul at Antwerp, Belgium, beginning in 1914, prior to the time we entered the war and prior to the time that the American Government furnished him with ample assistance, resulted in his physical breakdown and eventually in his death.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I am in favor of the bill, but I would like to know what the Claims Committee had to do with it.

Mr. SCHAFER. I will say to the gentleman that a number of these bills have been referred to the Claims Committee. In view of the fact that an appropriation is involved, the Claims Committee believed that it should have jurisdiction. Within the past month or two the Claims Committee has had four or five similar bills referred to it. This Friday, at the Claims Committee meeting, I am prepared to recommend favorable action on a bill introduced by Senator WAGNER, which is practically identical with this bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object in order to ask a question. We now have a law that takes care of the widows of officers dying in the Foreign Service, and that law provides for the payment of one year's salary, does it not?

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes; I believe so.

Mr. BLANTON. Why does not this man come under that law?

Mr. SCHAFER. He does not. The gentleman is a distinguished lawyer and a former distinguished judge of the State of Texas. The gentleman knows that employees who have been separated from the service of the Government prior to the enactment of a law which did not contain a retroactive provision can not receive the benefit of such law.

Mr. BLANTON. Then this is an extension of the law.

Mr. SCHAFER. No; this is merely following the precedents and is an exception.

Mr. BLANTON. This is to make it retroactive, and then it will take in all similar cases.

Mr. SCHAFER. Oh, no; I know the gentleman has followed this calendar and knows the situation in that respect.

Mr. BLANTON. Unless the gentleman is going to answer my questions in the proper kind of way I shall object. I am trying to get some information.

Mr. SCHAFER. Naturally, this case can not be taken care of under the existing general law. If it could, there would not be any necessity for having it appear on the private calendar just like these other bills.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman answer my questions as I ask them?

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. This is extending the law and making it retroactive, is it not?

Mr. SCHAFER. In this particular case; yes.

Mr. BLANTON. And if we do that for this case, to be consistent, as the gentleman from Wisconsin always is, we must give the same right to every widow of every officer who died prior to that act.

Mr. SCHAFER. That has been done in similar cases.

Mr. BLANTON. But it ought to come through the Foreign Affairs Committee, where these matters belong, and until that is done, Mr. Speaker, I regret very much to have to object to my friend's bill, but I object.

Mr. SCHAFER. I shall have to object to some that the gentleman is interested in on the same grounds.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say also that any similar claim coming before the House on this calendar I shall object to unless it comes from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. SCHAFER. Then I respectfully suggest that the gentleman has been derelict in his duty, because he will find that the Claims Committee has reported identical bills for some of the gentleman's Democratic colleagues in the other body and the gentleman did not raise any objection. We have four or five such bills now pending in the Claims Committee, including the bill of Senator WAGNER, and if the gentleman wants the bill brought before his committee, although I have considered the bill as a subcommittee of the Committee on Claims and have told Senator WAGNER that it would be favorably reported on Friday, I suggest that the gentleman have all such bills referred to his committee, providing he finds that said committee has authority to appropriate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair may state that the Foreign Affairs Committee would not have jurisdiction of this bill as it involves the payment of money.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The Foreign Affairs Committee would have jurisdiction to authorize the payment of money.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill involves an appropriation.

The Clerk will call the next bill on the calendar.

JOHN L. HOFFMAN

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1205, for the relief of John L. Hoffman.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MEAD. Will the gentleman withhold his objection a moment?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I reserve the objection for a moment.

Mr. MEAD. May I ask the gentleman just what his particular objection is to the bill?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. The report indicates that this is an effort to put a National Guard claim on the United States Government; and, apparently from the report, if there is a valid claim, it should be paid by whoever is responsible for the National Guard, which would be the State.

Mr. MEAD. I will say to the gentleman that the National Guard was federalized at that time and under the jurisdiction of the War Department. The claimant took his case up with the State authorities at Albany, and they referred him to Washington to the War Department. The National Guard was federalized and assigned the duty of protecting the railroads. The railroads were under control of the Federal Government.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. While this may be the old Army game——

Mr. MEAD. Oh, no; not at all. It is a just claim.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. However, the report does not make a showing that the National Guard was under the authority of the War Department and that they were responsible; in fact, the War Department denies the claim.

Mr. MEAD. The War Department does not deny the justice of the claim. The War Department states that the injuries were not as severe as indicated by the claimant. However, this is purely a matter for the Federal Government, because the National Guard was federalized and therefore the State properly disclaims all jurisdiction in the matter. The only recourse this claimant has, who was severely injured by an intoxicated guardsman, who beat him up with the end of his gun, crippling him practically for life, was to come to the Federal Government. He took up his claim with the local military authorities, as well as at the State capital, and in every available place, and was in each case referred to the Federal Government. The Claims Committee agrees that this is the record.

This is a case where a railroad man with a proper pass was going to his work and trying to cross a bridge to reach his train, and a soldier who was drunk, and afterwards convicted and sentenced, assaulted him with the butt end of his rifle and knocked him senseless. He was taken to the hospital and after a day or so, while still in a dazed condition, he left and went to his home. He was laid up for five weeks as a result of this injury. He now has a hole in his head which, so far as the bone is concerned, has not healed over. He has an impaired vision and is subject to dizzy spells.

May I say to the gentleman further that when the claim was filed here it was referred to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DOXEY] as a subcommittee of the Claims Committee, and a claim was requested by Mr. Dempsey, a former Member, and myself, for $5,000. This was reviewed and reduced to $2,000, and the bill was thereafter reported favorably.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield right there for me to ask a question?

Mr. MEAD. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. With regard to the hole in the claimant's head, the report of the War Department says:

> Nothing appears in the files of this department to indicate his injuries were either serious or permanent, nor that he lost any time from his work other than on the night of June 16, 1917. There is no legal liability on the part of the Government, and the question of relief by the United States is one of grace only.

Mr. MEAD. In the report furnished the committee is the statement by the superintendent of the Lehigh Valley Railroad showing that the man was off on sick leave from June 16 to July 23. That report, together with the report of the doctor, was considered authentic by the committee. The department is in error, as represented by everybody that has had anything to do with the case.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from New York is a valuable man in the House, and he watches legislation very closely. Is the gentleman prepared to say that we should disregard the report of the War Department, throw it to the winds, and take the report of the injured man against that of the department?

Mr. MEAD. We have the report of the injured man, of the superintendent of the railroad, the doctor, and a number of others explaining the nature and extent of the injuries. I have affidavits of an officer of the National Guard and others proving the case of the claimant.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I object.

FRANK KANELAKOS

The Clerk read the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 1279, for the relief of Frank Kanelakos.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue to Frank Kanelakos, of Newport News, Va., one permanent United States coupon bond in the denomination of $100 of the fourth Liberty loan 4¼ per cent bonds of 1933–1938, with coupon due April 15, 1921, and coupons to maturity attached thereto, in lieu of temporary coupon bond No. 220087 of the same loan in the denomination of $100 with no coupons attached or presented, the upper portion of which bond has been presented to the Treasury Department: Provided, That the lower portion of the said bond shall not have been previously presented or ascertained to be in existence, and that no payment shall be made hereunder for any coupons which may have been attached to the temporary bond: Provided further, That the said Frank Kanelakos shall first file in the Treasury Department a bond in the penal sum of double the amount of the bond and the interest which would accrue until the principal becomes due and payable, in such form and with such sureties as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury, to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any loss on account of the mutilated bond hereinbefore described.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GREAT WESTERN COAL MINES CO.

The Clerk read the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 2065, for the relief of the Great Western Coal Mines Co.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this bill involves $15,000.

Mr. COLTON. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. COLTON. This is for the repayment of money which this company paid to the Government. It was denied by the comptroller purely on a technicality of law. The Comptroller General says that the law would have permitted him to repay had the proof been rejected, but he relinquished the claim, and the law does not provide for repayment in case of relinquishment. The Government has the land and the money both. The company has been out the use of the money for several years. This claim is a very just one. The payment of this just claim may save the company whether it can continue or not. There was a charge of fraud raised, but the department has found that there was no fraud.

Mr. BLANTON. Here is what the comptroller says:

The repayment of purchase moneys paid for lands as authorized by the act of December 11, 1919, being conditioned upon the "rejection" of applications, entries, or proofs, and the failure of the entrymen in this matter to take or retain title to the lands, not having been due to a rejection by the Government within the meaning of said act but to a relinquishment of the entry which under the circumstances, no fraud having been established, must be considered voluntary. When the Congress has by law stipulated the condition under which a payment may be made, refund or otherwise, such condition must be shown to have been met to justify payment. As the fact of rejection by the United States, the condition stipulated by law as the basis for refundment, has not been and, apparently, can not be established, the only course open to this office is disallowance of the claim. It is, therefore, disallowed.

It was not a denial of right by the Government, but it was the man's relinquishing the right of the coal company.

Mr. COLTON. That is a technicality of law. Had he gone on and allowed the commissioner to reject the proof, then his money would have been refunded to him. But rather than do that he relinquished to the Government his claim, and the Government has both the land and the money. The gentleman will find that statement in the letter of the commissioner in 1930. The members of this company are among the finest citizens of my State. This is a just measure in every particular.

Mr. STAFFORD. I call the attention of the gentleman from Texas to the following from the report of the department:

By decision dated October 11, 1927, the department held that the testimony in the case, as a whole, convincingly showed that the burden of proof had been sustained by appellants; that no fraud or attempted fraud having been shown, as a matter of justice and equity, repayment should be allowed.

After examining that, I was in accord with the position stated by the gentleman from Utah [Mr. COLTON] that the Government has both the land and the money.

Mr. COLTON. It was purely a technicality of law that it was denied upon.

Mr. BLANTON. Lots of men have taken up public land in States, say, like Texas, and then have relinquished their rights to others.

Mr. COLTON. But this was not that case. The Government has the land now and has the money that this man paid.

Mr. BLANTON. But he had the use of it.

Mr. COLTON. No; he did not use it at all; that is, the company got no benefit for which it did not pay.

Mr. BLANTON. And the probable value of that use.

Mr. COLTON. Not at all. He never got a dollar's worth of benefit from it at all. There could not be a more just claim than this.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Wisconsin is going to let this go by, I shall not object.

Mr. STAFFORD. I went over it very carefully and have no question about the merits of it at all.

Mr. COLTON. It is absolutely a just claim.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to the Great Western Coal Mines Co., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $16,600 in full satisfaction of its claim for refund of purchase money paid by Richard L. Bird in connection with coal land entry No. 025342, title to the lands covered thereby having been relinquished to the United States by the Great Western Coal Mines Co. as assignee of such Richard L. Bird.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

NELSON E. FRISSELL

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2161) for the relief of Nelson E. Frissell.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve the right to object. I am reminded privately that this bill passed the House in its present form in the last Congress. In going over the report carefully I thought the claimant rather padded his claim. I could not find any proof whatsoever for the claim of loss of certain material and for freight and cartage, amounting to $1,724.28. He has a detailed statement of expenses, but some of them are rather questionable. For instance, he puts in the value of his services at the rate of $35 per day. I think it would be fair if we were to put in the amount at $4,000, which would be a liberal allowance for this man.

I am not taking the position that this claimant is not entitled to some relief, but I think he is asking too much for the little work he did while he was negotiating for a building for a post-office station which the Government canceled.

Mr. FOSS. This contract was as follows: It was for the term of 20 years with the privilege of renewal for such additional time as the Government might desire, and the building to be erected at an annual rental of $6,350 for the first five years, $5,750 for the second five years, $5,150 for the third five years, and $4,550 for the fourth five years, and 4 per cent per annum thereafter, with an option of buying at the end of the period for $20,000.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no question about what the contract was. The question is, what damages did he suffer in that short period of a few months, when the department notified him that there would not be any further need of this projected postal station, because this publishing house had changed its headquarters.

Mr. FOSS. Let me call attention to the fact that he had bought his steel for the steel frame of the building, that it was fabricated, that he had ordered his lumber, and that he had leased the land from the Maine Central Railroad, which, of course, was for the nominal sum of $1 a year, but as I understand it, he holds that lease to-day and is holding it until it is settled. The Postmaster General advises that he thinks that if the man went to court with the case he would be awarded more.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman states that he purchased the fabricated steel and lumber?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is nothing in the report to show that. Does the gentleman know that of his own knowledge?

Mr. FOSS. Yes; I have it in a letter which I have here.

Mr. STAFFORD. I have read the report of the Postmaster General, found in three finely printed pages, and did not find any such statement. If he purchased fabricated material and lumber, of course that is an item of expense that ought to be included.

Mr. FOSS. Then there are five years of interest on the money that he has had tied up.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not wish to be too critical in these matters. If that is the fact, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Will the gentleman accept an amendment as to the amount?

Mr. FOSS. What does the gentleman suggest?

Mr. MOUSER. Four thousand dollars.

Mr. FOSS. That is not enough. I would be willing to compromise if there was any reason for it, but here is a case where this man spent this money in 1925 or 1926. There are five or six years of interest.

Mr. MOUSER. He is not getting that amount.

Mr. FOSS. I know, but the court would take that into consideration if it went to court.

Mr. MOUSER. If the gentleman is not willing to accept an amendment, I fear I shall have to object.

Mr. FOSS. I think it ought to be at least $5,000.

Mr. MOUSER. Will the gentleman accept an amendment of $5,000?

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

Mr. MOUSER. I withdraw the objection subject to that amendment.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Speaker, there is one other amendment I will like to add. Will the gentleman agree to another amendment correcting the text, not the amount.

Mr. FOSS. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Nelson E. Frissell, of East Templeton, Mass., the sum of $7,219.52. Such sum represents the money expended, the value of services performed, and the damages sustained by Nelson E. Frissell in connection with a contract with the Post Office Department for the construction and lease of a post-office building at Augusta, Me., which contract was canceled by the Post Office Department: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MOUSER: Page 1, line 6, strike out the figures "$7,219.52" and insert in lieu thereof "$5,000, in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CHARLES BERETTA, ISIDORE J. PROULX, AND JOHN J. WEST

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 3540, for the relief of Charles Beretta, Isidore J. Proulx, and John J. West.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States is authorized and directed to cancel the claim of the United States against Charles Beretta as temporary substitute parcel-post carrier, Willows, Calif., at 60 cents per hour for a period from November 13, 1922, to December 31, 1924, and at 65 cents per hour from January 1, 1925, to March 31, 1926, in the sum of $723.55, representing payments to him as such employee for a period from November 13, 1922, to March 31, 1926, he having also held the position of temporary laborer, custodian service, Federal Building, Willows, Calif., for a period from November 13, 1922, to March 15, 1923, at $660 per annum (with $240 increase), the position of permanent laborer in said service at said place for period from March 16, 1923, to June 30, 1924, at $660 per annum (with $240 increase), and the position of permanent laborer in said service at said place for period from July 1, 1924, to March 31, 1926, at $960 per annum, and the combined amount of the per annum rates of compensation of such positions being in excess of $2,000 per annum, contrary to the provisions of section 6 of the act of May 10, 1916 (39 Stat. L., p. 120), as amended by the act of August 29, 1916 (39 Stat. L., p. 582).

SEC. 2. That the Comptroller General of the United States is further authorized and directed to release Isidore J. Proulx, former postmaster at Willows, Calif., from liability to the United States for payments to said Charles Beretta for the period from November 13, 1922, to September 8, 1924, amounting to $349.20; and to release John J. West, present postmaster at Willows, Calif., from liability to the United States for payments to said Charles Beretta for the period from September 9, 1924, to March 31, 1926, amounting to $374.35; and to repay said John J. West said amount of $374.35 refunded by him to the United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SAME GIACALONE AND SAME INGRANDE

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 3604, for the relief of Same Giacalone and Same Ingrande.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Same Giacalone and Same Ingrande, of San Diego, Calif., in full settlement against the Government, the sum of $459.55, the actual cost of repairing the damage caused to the vessel Cornell, owned by said Same Giacalone and Same Ingrande, by the United States Coast Guard boat Imp, together with the sum of $240 for loss of the use of said boat Cornell while same was being repaired.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, I offer a perfecting amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MOUSER: Page 1, in line 6, after the word "settlement," insert the words "of all claims and demands."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the usual attorney's fee amendment at the end of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MOUSER: At the end of the bill insert the following:

"Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENEVIEVE M. HEBERLE

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 4230, for the relief of Genevieve M. Heberle.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, with the amendment that it shall be in full settlement, I shall not object, but that amendment should be added.

Mr. MOUSER. I was about to make the same suggestion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BLANTON. After the figures "$2,000," insert the words "in full settlement."

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Genevieve M. Heberle the sum of $10,000 for personal injuries sustained when she was struck and seriously injured by an automobile truck of the United States Postal Service in the city of St. Paul, Minn., on July 3, 1923.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 6, strike out "$10,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,000."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment to the committee amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 1, line 6, after the figures "$2,000," insert the words "in full settlement."

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

Page 1, line 9, after the figures "1923," insert "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LIEUT. COL. H. H. KIPP, UNITED STATES MARINE CORPS, RETIRED

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 4264, for the relief of Lieut. Col. H. H. Kipp, United States Marine Corps, retired.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Lieut. Col. H. H. Kipp, United States Marine Corps, retired, the sum of $243.19. Such sum represents the amount deducted from the pay of Lieutenant Colonel Kipp for expenses incurred by the United States in transporting his wife and daughter from Mare Island, Calif., to Boston, Mass., less the cost of transportation of such dependents from the District of Columbia to Boston, Mass.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

W. R. M'LEOD

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4310, for the relief of W. R. McLeod.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, with regard to this bill I want to call attention to what Hon. Walter F. Brown, the Postmaster General, has said:

The money was not protected in the manner prescribed by section 110, Postal Laws and Regulations, reading as follows:

"Postmasters must exercise all possible care for the protection of the public funds and property in their custody.

"When funds or postage stamps are left at night in offices unprovided with iron safes, they shall be kept in strong drawers or other fixed receptacles, which shall be securely fastened with good locks. The doors and windows of the office shall be made as secure as possible. The same precautions shall be taken when the post office is closed temporarily during the day."

Inasmuch as section 121 of the regulations requires postmasters at offices of the third class to remit all surplus postal funds whenever the amount equals or exceeds $100, a considerable portion of the postal funds reported lost in the burglary were overdue for remittance, which constitutes a further bar to allowance of credit.

It appearing that the loss resulted from negligence within the meaning of the law hereinbefore cited, I am unable to recommend favorable action on the proposed legislation, and the facts are submitted for the use of your committee and for such action as Congress may desire to take.

With such a report, Mr. Speaker, I am constrained to object.

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman withhold his objections?

Mr. BACHMANN. If the gentleman does not object, I shall object. I objected to this bill at the last session.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not shirk responsibility, and never have. When I feel it my duty to object, I object; and I shall not throw that burden upon the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman reserve his objection for a minute?

Mr. BLANTON. If the House is willing, I am.

Mr. GREEN. The report of the committee clearly shows the postmaster locked the door of the little post office. It clearly shows he took as much precaution as was in his power to take. It further shows the money was stolen and the department does not blame him or hold him responsible.

Mr. MOUSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. Certainly.

Mr. MOUSER. Two gentlemen have indicated they are going to object. Why take up the time of the House in view of that situation?

Mr. GREEN. I was just trying to explain to the House that this is only in line with a number of other bills that have been passed. It is customary to make reimbursement in such cases.

I hope the gentleman will not object, and that the bill will be passed.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say to my friend from Florida that the postmasters must take care of the people's funds and they must obey the law.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

JOHN L. FRIEL

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4925, for the relief of John L. Friel.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to John L. Friel, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $4,750 on account of damages sustained to his property through lack of protection to his property when Lock No. 4, Allegheny River, was constructed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 1, line 6, after the figures, strike out "on account of" and insert in lieu thereof the words "in full payment of all."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the customary attorney's fees amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STAFFORD: At the end of the paragraph insert the following:

"Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

MARY F. CRIM

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5058, for the relief of Mary F. Crim.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if the gentleman will agree to accept an amendment reducing the amount from $10,000 to $2,500, as suggested by the committee, I shall not object.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I accept the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I have difficulty in bringing myself around to the feeling that the National Government has any obligation whatsoever to pay any money under the facts disclosed in the report in this case.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, the facts are the deceased was subpœnaed by the United States Government as a witness for the Government in a Federal case at the Federal court in Columbus, Ga. He testified as a witness. After his testimony was concluded he went to the toilet in the court building, laid his revolver on the lavatory, and was sitting on the stool. Two court officials, one a court crier and one a bailiff, came in and knocked his pistol off of the lavatory onto the concrete floor. A cartridge exploded and the bullet struck the man. He died within a very short time. He would not have died or would not have been subject to the injury if he had not been called as a witness for the Government.

Mr. BACHMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. I yield.

Mr. BACHMANN. According to the statement the gentleman has made, there is not a witness mentioned in the report who was an eyewitness of what happened. All you have is the report of a clerk who was not there. However, I do not mean to doubt the truth of the statement of the gentleman.

Mr. WRIGHT. The truth is the two witnesses are both dead, but this occurred right there in the court room. We have a witness whose testimony is in the record, who heard the report of the pistol and found this situation and heard the statement of the deceased.

Mr. BLANTON. He was an officer and had a right to carry a pistol.

Mr. WRIGHT. That is correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. It was merely an accident. I could not subscribe to the policy of paying out something for such an accident.

Mr. WRIGHT. Most anything might be called an accident. In private affairs, if a private individual opens a building and invites the public into it and does not keep it perfectly safe, he is responsible.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman states the decedent was an officer of the State of Georgia?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why would he not be entitled to State compensation?

Mr. WRIGHT. There is nothing like that in the State.

The State was not responsible for his being there. The Government of the United States subpœnaed him.

Mr. STAFFORD. If an officer in the performance of his duty suffers an injury, the State is obligated to pay for any accident resulting in the course of his employment.

Mr. WRIGHT. It was not a State court.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not like to barter as to the amount to be carried in the bill. I just can not see any obligation, but if the gentleman will accept $2,000 I think that will be a very fair amount.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will accept that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, I object, if this is the case I have in mind, where this man was accidentally hurt by a pistol he laid on the lavatory. In that case it was clearly an accident and it was no fault on the part of the Government.

Mr. WRIGHT. But the pistol was knocked off by court officials.

Mr. MOUSER. But they are not in the position of being agents of the Government.

Mr. WRIGHT. They were there representing the Government and they were officers of the court.

Mr. MOUSER. It was purely an accident. Of course, the man who was injured was negligent in putting the pistol on the lavatory.

Mr. BLANTON. He had to put it somewhere.

Mr. WRIGHT. He could not keep it in his hip pocket while he was sitting on the stool.

Mr. BLANTON. If he had not been summoned to attend court, he would have been at home and would have been safe.

Mr. MOUSER. The fact that he was subpœnaed to attend the court does not have anything to do with the fact that he was injured in the toilet.

Mr. WRIGHT. It was an incident of the whole transaction.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

LAURA GOLDWATER

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5149, for the relief of Laura Goldwater.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BLOOM. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. MOUSER. I will withhold it; yes.

Mr. BLOOM. This is a very meritorious case. This truck was traveling on a 1-way street. There is no testimony of any of the witnesses under oath that this woman was at fault. This woman spent $7,020 of her own money for hospital and doctors' bills. This bill has been favorably recommended by the committee in two different Congresses. If the gentleman desires to ask me any questions I will be glad to show him that this is a meritorious case.

Mr. MOUSER. I presume the gentleman will agree with the facts as shown in the report, that at about the time this truck was approaching the intersection this woman stepped out toward the street car tracks and the driver, exercising his sense of sight, saw her and swerved to the left to avoid striking her, but she deliberately went forward instead of backward, and stepped against the side of the truck. I sympathize with the lady who was injured and the fact she had to spend this large sum of money, but I can not see any responsibility on the part of the Government. The driver of the truck was entirely faultless.

Mr. BLOOM. Let me explain to the gentleman that this truck was coming down the wrong way on a one-way street. In other words, it was a westbound street and he was going east, which he had no right to do.

Mr. BACHMANN. There is nothing to that effect in the report.

Mr. BLOOM. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The report shows that in the lady's statement.

Mr. BACHMANN. I think the report shows that the driver of the truck was not negligent. If the report shows that the driver was going in the wrong direction on a 1-way street, that would be negligence.

Mr. MOUSER. I would concede that, but we certainly would have to have some corroborative evidence supporting the statement of the lady that it was a 1-way street.

Mr. BLOOM. It was a 1-way street. There is no contradiction of the fact that it was a 1-way street, only the driver said he did not come down that street but came around on Third Avenue. There is no statement on the part of anybody under oath outside of the statement made by Mrs. Goldwater and the doctors.

Mr. MOUSER. Why not permit this bill to be passed over in order that the gentleman may furnish some corroborative evidence?

Mr. BLOOM. I have given up the night for this and have spent several nights waiting for this bill to be called.

Mr. MOUSER. I have the very highest respect for the gentleman and I know he is sincere in presenting this bill; but we can not raid the Treasury on the mere ground of sympathy.

If the gentleman wants us to give her a present of this small amount, and no objection is made——

Mr. BLOOM. No; I would not come before the House and ask for any present.

Mr. MOUSER. No; I do not believe the gentleman wants that.

Mr. BLOOM. If the gentleman will examine the report, he will find there is no statement under oath about what the driver has said in the matter. There is a statement from the inspector, but that statement is not under oath. The only statements under oath are the statement from the doctor and the statement from Mrs. Goldwater. There were no witnesses to the accident.

Mr. MOUSER. No; but it is to be presumed the inspector got a statement from the driver.

Mr. BLOOM. Then why did they not submit a statement from the driver made under oath? The statement of Mrs. Goldwater is under oath, and, if there is no contradictory statement, her statement should stand unchallenged.

The situation was just the same as if the gentlemen were standing on a corner and, naturally, would not expect the driver to drive down a 1-way street. The gentleman would have every right to believe that no driver would be coming in that direction.

Mr. MOUSER. As I understand from members of the Claims Committee, the committee does not include in its report, on account of the space and the expense involved, all the evidence, and therefore we must base our opinion upon the report of the committee.

Mr. BLOOM. The chairman of the Claims Committee in the Seventy-first Congress and the chairman of the Claims Committee in the Seventy-second Congress reported this bill favorably, and there is nothing in the report contradictory of the statements made by Mrs. Goldwater. If the gentleman could show me a thing in the report that contradicts any of her statements, I would not press the bill for consideration.

Mr. BACHMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLOOM. I shall be pleased to yield.

Mr. BACHMANN. Did this accident happen on a 1-way street?

Mr. BLOOM. No; as I have stated, it happened about 5 or 10 feet off of the street. This woman was standing by the Third Avenue elevated and the truck was coming down the street, and she started to go across the street, not thinking the truck would be coming down a 1-way street, and the truck hit her.

Mr. MOUSER. If the gentleman from New York will agree to an amendment making the amount $2,500, I shall not object.

Mr. BLOOM. I presume I shall have to agree to that.

Mr. MOUSER. I make this suggestion in view of the statement of the gentleman, who apparently is acquainted with the facts, although his statement is somewhat at variance with the record.

Mr. BLOOM. I am acquainted with the facts only according to the record in the case. I was not at the accident, of course.

Mr. MOUSER. Does the gentleman know this woman?

Mr. BLOOM. No; but she is a constituent of mine.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Laura Goldwater the sum of $20,000 for damages suffered by her by reason of being struck and seriously injured by a Government mail truck.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 6, strike out "$20,000" and insert "$5,000."

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment. In line 6, strike out "$5,000" and insert "$2,500" and the following: "in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOUSER: Page 1, line 6, amendment to the committee amendment: Strike out "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,500, in full settlement of all claims against the Government of the United States."

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, I offer another amendment. In line 6, after the word "her," insert the date of the accident, "on March 18, 1929."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOUSER: Page 1, line 6, after the word "her," insert the words "on March 18, 1929."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOUSER. Also in line 8, after the word "truck," insert the words "in the city of New York."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOUSER: Page 1, line 8, after the word "truck," insert the words "in the city of New York."

The amendment was agreed to.

Also the committee amendment:

"Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

JOHN W. ADAIR

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5187, for the relief of John W. Adair.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

THOMAS J. BERRY

The Clerk read the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 5362, for the relief of Maj. Thomas J. Berry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. SCHAFER. I was chairman of the subcommittee, and I attempted to state all of the facts as far as I could in the report. The beneficiary was a major during the war. A serious epidemic broke out in camp, and in order to protect the other soldiers the major ordered Private Sprouse taken to an isolation hospital.

Later some attorneys contacted the parents of this man, and they commenced a series of lawsuits throughout the country. The major was persecuted and harassed, and was required to pay expenses for legal services trying to protect himself from these many lawsuits. We found that the major was rendering service not only to the soldiers but also to Private Sprouse himself, and in no way was he negligent, but he was acting in the performance of his duty.

The bill covers the actual losses to the major by reason of the lawsuits. I studied the number of cases for legal work, and I found that the man's expenditure for legal services was very low indeed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield? My position was prompted by the attitude taken by the full Committee on Military Affairs against allowing any claimant expenses that he might incur in attorney's fees in defending claims. In this case the Secretary of War says that this officer could have obtained without expense law officers of the Government to conduct the defense. It is on that theory that I marked the bill for objection.

Mr. SCHAFER. This officer was a medical man, and not a lawyer, and did not have knowledge of the intricate provisions of law. I doubt if at that time he could have obtained the services of attorneys for the Government all over the country, and if he did, I think the traveling expenses alone would have been many times the amount of this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, perhaps I would not be doing violence to the policy established by the Committee on Military Affairs if I permitted this bill to pass. I withdraw the objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $543.42 to Maj. Thomas J. Berry, commanding Companies C and D, Third Ohio Infantry, to reimburse him for expenses incurred in defending himself in suits instituted by relatives of Pvt. Seymour M. Sprouse, of Company C, Third Ohio Infantry.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

MARY F. CRIM

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 241, H. R. 5058, for the relief of Mary F. Crim.

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, I understand the gentleman realizes there is an error in the printed bill. The bill calls for $10,000, and the committee recommended $2,500.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, I object for the time being.

ARTHUR N. ASHMORE

The Clerk read the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 7469, for the relief of Arthur N. Ashmore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Will the gentleman withhold that objection?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. This identical bill has passed the House three times. I suppose the gentleman objects on the ground that the Secretary of War in the report indicates that the injured party was not in the employ of the Government?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I call attention to an error contained in that report as to the facts in the case, and also as to the law governing the particular facts in the case. In the report of the Secretary of War he says:

In this connection attention is invited to the fact that the wording of the bill, in line 10, citing Battery B, One hundred and thirtieth Field Artillery, as belonging to the "National Guard of the United States," is misleading, the correct designation being "Texas National Guard."

I submit to the gentleman the discharge prepared in this case, which shows that the bill was drafted in accordance with the language prescribed by the War Department, "National Guard of the United States," and it was not the Texas National Guard.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Yes; and we always do in court, in a case like this, we look at the exhibit, read the next line, and find it reads, "and of the State of Texas."

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. The report says it should say the Texas National Guard, which is not correct. It is the National Guard of the United States. This young man was detailed to the care of property that was en route to the National Guard encampment. In the discharge of that duty, in going from one car to another he fell from the train and lost his arm, which was cut off so high up to the armpit that even an artificial arm can not be used. I have a brief here in respect to the law which I would like to discuss with the gentleman if I had the time. Under the law creating the National Guard it is required that the National Guard unit attend these encampments. The pay which this man was receiving as a caretaker being detailed to guard this property was paid by the Federal Government.

The property he was guarding at the time he lost his arm belonged to the Government of the United States. The oath that he took when he became a member of the National Guard is prescribed by the statute of the United States. The discharge that he received after he received the injury is upon a form prescribed by the statutes of the United States. He was guarding property belonging to the United States; he was paid by the United States; in the employ of the United States at the time he received his injury; and he was en route to an encampment which the law required him to attend as a member of the National Guard. It occurs to me that under the rule governing cases of this kind the doctrine of master and servant would obtain. In addition to that, the young man is now in a hospital with tuberculosis and is in a very low state of health, probably will never get well. The Government recognized that he was in the employ of the Government at the time for they paid for some medical bills when he was injured.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Everything the gentleman says is entirely consonant with the services of an enlisted man or officer in the National Guard; that is, in the great opportunity of being an attendant with the United States Army in connection with annual maneuvers. I find in this group of bills that apparently there is a movement on foot now to charge the United States Government with the results of accidents that occurred during that period. Heretofore most of the States have borne the cost of such accidents. Perhaps the State of Texas never has, and maybe it never will, but I can not see, after examining a few cases and my recollection of other cases in days gone by, why there should be a charge made against the United States Government for this most unfortunate accident. It is a very distressing case; the man has lost an arm, but there is no liability or even a duty on the part of the United States Government to take care of him. The fact that he was taken care of was merely an incident to the immediate service, and then he might or might not be transported to his State, depending on circumstances of the case, but not on any question of liability.

Mr. PURNELL. What does the gentleman say in answer to the statement that he was working under orders.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. He was detailed as a caretaker.

Mr. PURNELL. And as such he was acting under authority from which he could not remove himself.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. That is true.

Mr. MOUSER. At the time these men are going to the national encampment they receive Federal pay and they are actually in the Federal service, so that it seems to me that he was a Federal soldier at that time, the same as a man in the Regular Army. I think there is that distinction.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. PURNELL. I would like to pursue this case a little farther.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. He received his injury while protecting property belonging to the United States and was being paid for his services at that time by the United States.

Mr. PURNELL. Would it have been possible for this soldier to have forsaken his duty at any point along the line?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. It is never the province of any soldier at any time whether in the National Guard or the Federal service to forsake his duty, but when an accident occurs and a claim arises he must go to the responsible source, and whether it is the State from which his National Guard unit comes or the United States depends on the circumstances of the case.

The United States and the War Department have no liability and accept no responsibility in connection with certain cases, and according to the statement of the Secretary of War this is one of those cases. It is unfortunate that the State will not take care of this man and is trying to pass off the liability to the United States.

Mr. PURNELL. It is the position of the gentleman that the States should take care of these cases rather than the Federal Government?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Exactly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I object.

JOSEPH A. M'CARTHY

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 925, for the relief of Joseph A. McCarthy.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is an accident which occurred prior to the passage of the compensation act of 1916.

Mr. RUDD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. RUDD. The compensation act, as I understand it, was for the purpose of stopping laches. This man is not guilty of laches, because, as a matter of fact, while the injury was sustained in the fall of 1912, he was kept in the hospital until December, 1913; and two weeks thereafter, on January 2, 1914, he filed his claim and has been endeavoring ever since to get some relief. As a matter of fact, the bill was reported out in the Sixty-sixth Congress and not reached. It was reported in the Seventy-first Congress and not reached. The man's leg was broken. It is 1 inch shorter than the other leg. All he is asking is $1,000 for permanent injury and $650 for wages.

Mr. STAFFORD. The report shows that this seaman was in service shortly afterward. The Government has been generous in keeping him in employment at his regular pay. I feel constrained to object.

Mr. RUDD. The gentleman does not want to give him anything for his permanent injury?

Mr. STAFFORD. He has been in service continually.

Mr. RUDD. No. He is not in service now.

Mr. STAFFORD. He was returned to duty as seaman on the transport Logan and is now in service on the transport.

Mr. RUDD. That was in 1914.

Mr. STAFFORD. But he was able to do his work.

Mr. RUDD. For perhaps six months.

Mr. STAFFORD. And now the gentleman is asking the Government to pay $1,650.

Mr. RUDD. We want $1,000 for the permanent injury. One leg is 1 inch shorter than the other and the gentleman does not propose to give him anything for that? Even though he is able to work he is not as able as he was formerly.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why did he not receive the one year's compensation, as provided in the compensation act then in force?

Mr. RUDD. I do not know. He has been trying ever since 1914.

Mr. STAFFORD. The law permitted him to receive one year's salary.

Mr. RUDD. But he has never received it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I will go over this matter further. For the time being I object.

JACOB D. HANSON

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 7449, for the relief of the heirs of Jacob D. Hanson.

There being no objection, the Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the heirs of Jacob D. Hanson, the sum of $5,000 for all damages suffered by reason of the said Jacob D. Hanson's being shot and fatally injured, without cause or justification, while traveling on a highway near Niagara Falls, N. Y., on the night of the 5th of May, 1928, by two members of the United States Coast Guard, the said members being then and there on duty as coast guardsmen and acting as such.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BLANTON: In line 6, after the word "damages," insert the words "and in full settlement of all claims against the Government for injuries."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. I offer, at the end of the bill, the usual attorney's fee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BLANTON: At the end of the bill insert the following:

"Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

VALIDATING CERTAIN CONVEYANCES BY CENTRAL PACIFIC RAILWAY CO., ETC.

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 406, to validate a certain conveyance heretofore made by Central Pacific Railway Co., a corporation, and its lessee, Southern Pacific Co., a corporation, to Pacific States Box & Basket Co., a corporation, involving certain portions of right of way in the vicinity of the town of Florin, county of Sacramento, State of California, acquired by the Central Pacific Railway Co. under the act of Congress approved July 1, 1862 (12 Stat. L. 489), as amended by the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864 (13 Stat. L. 356).

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has the gentleman from California been near this village or city where this lot is located, and is it valuable property?

Mr. EVANS of California. I have been there several times, but I was not conscious of it.

Mr. ARENTZ. The gentleman does not think it is worth very much?

Mr. EVANS of California. The property in this little country place is not very valuable.

Mr. ARENTZ. I understand that all land in California is valuable.

Mr. EVANS of California. Well, especially in southern California, that is quite true.

Mr. ARENTZ. This is not in southern California.

Mr. EVANS of California. This is in northern California.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, about what is the total value of this land?

Mr. EVANS of California. I am unable to state as to the total value of it. I will say, however, to the gentleman that this property has been in private ownership for 40 years. It is nine-tenths of an acre. I am not sure as to the value of it, but I know it has been in private ownership for 40 years, and this basket factory has been on this property for more than 30 years.

Mr. ARENTZ. I do not see how any objection can be found to this bill. Our Committee on Public Lands investigated it quite thoroughly. I do not believe the land is worth very much.

Mr. EVANS of California. The gentleman from Nevada and other Members of Congress validated 42 of this kind of conveyance at the last session of Congress.

Mr. SCHAFER. This basket company purchased the land, believing that the railroad company from whom the purchase was made had full title?

Mr. EVANS of California. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. And would be able to give title?

Mr. EVANS of California. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. And now they find there is a cloud on the title?

Mr. EVANS of California. By construction of the Supreme Court of the United States, the courts have held that the railroad company had not the technical right to convey fee simple title, and that the right of prescription could not apply, even though it has been 40 years.

Mr. SCHAFER. This bill will not result in a charge on the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. EVANS of California. Absolutely not; and the department approves it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the conveyance in the form of a quitclaim deed executed by Central Pacific Railway Co., a corporation, and its lessee, Southern Pacific Co., a corporation, as grantors, to the Pacific States Box & Basket Co., a corporation, as grantee, under date of October 20, 1930, and recorded in the office of the county recorder of Sacramento County, Calif., on the 3d day of November, 1930, in book No. 321, page , official records of said county, involving certain lands or interests therein in the vicinity of the town of Florin, county of Sacramento, State of California, and forming a part of the right of way of said Central Pacific Railway Co. granted by the Government of the United States of America by an act of Congress approved July 1, 1862, entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes" (12 Stat. L. 489), and by said act as amended by act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862" (13 Stat. L. 356), is hereby legalized, validated, and confirmed with the same force and effect as if the land involved therein had been held at the time of such conveyance by the above-named grantors making the same under absolute fee-simple title: Provided, That such legalization, validation, and confirmation shall not diminish said right of way to a width less than 50 feet on either side of the center of the main track or tracks of said Central Pacific Railway Co. as now established: Provided further, That nothing herein contained is intended or shall be construed to legalize, validate, or confirm any rights, titles, or interests based upon or arising out of adverse possession, prescription, or abandonment, and not confirmed by conveyance heretofore made by Central Pacific Railway Co. and its lessee, Southern Pacific Co.: And provided further, That there shall be reserved to the United States all oil, coal, or other minerals in the land, and the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

With the following committee amendment:

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EDNA M. GILSON

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1226, for the relief of Edna M. Gilson.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the accounts of Edna M. Gilson, postmaster at Steubenville, Ohio, in the sum of $1,389.80, due the United States on account of the loss of postal funds resulting from larceny and embezzlement.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

MARY F. CRIM

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 241, the bill (H. R. 5058) for the relief of Mary F. Crim.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. If unanimous consent is granted, will we still have the right to reserve the right to object?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes.

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. It is understood that the amendment agreed to by the gentleman from Georgia is to be offered and accepted?

Mr. WRIGHT. Two thousand dollars; yes.

Mr. BLANTON. In full settlement?

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there are two propositions involved in the bill to which attention should be paid. The first question that arises is whether or not there is any moral responsibility resting on the Government of the United States to reimburse a claimant for a purely accidental death. The second is that this is a case where a man lost his life. It is a serious matter, and such matters are usually investigated by police officials. In this case it happened in the Federal court building. There certainly must be some record at some place, either in the files of the city police department of this city or in the Federal court, from which it would appear who was responsible for the man's death. The report does not show anything of the kind. The report contains two newspaper articles, one of which says some person unknown who had been summoned in court as a witness knocked the gun off the lavatory and it exploded and killed the man.

Mr. WRIGHT. That is the newspaper report.

Mr. BACHMANN. That is the newspaper report quoted here in the form of an affidavit, saying that the newspaper report is a true report of the accident.

Mr. WRIGHT. A true report of what appeared in the newspaper.

Mr. BACHMANN. Yes; of what appeared in the paper with reference to the accident.

Mr. WRIGHT. That is all.

Mr. BACHMANN. The other affidavit is that of a deputy clerk of the Federal court. The accident happened in 1917, and the deputy court clerk makes an affidavit 10 years later, in 1927, in which he says he was not an eyewitness, but as he recalls the facts, this man Whatley walked in and knocked the gun off the lavatory when it exploded and killed the deceased.

If the gentleman from Georgia can supply any facts he may have personal knowledge of to supplement the report and will say to the House as a Member of the House that Whatley being the man who was in there and who was the court crier connected with the Federal court, knocked this gun off, I shall not object.

Mr. WRIGHT. A court record, of course, is kept of all these things, but the deputy clerk makes this affidavit, stating what report was made after the man was shot, that these two court officials, Whatley and Lawshe, went into the toilet and the pistol was knocked off by one or the other of them, he thinks Whatley.

There is an affidavit here by Mr. Clegg, who said:

After the said J. M. Crim had been carried to the said marshal's office, the court bailiff, apparently about 65 or 70 years of age, slim built, height about 5 feet 10 inches, and weight about 150 pounds, came into the marshal's office, apparently very much excited and nervous, and inquired as to how bad Mr. Crim was hurt. On being told of the serious nature of the wound, this man then stated that he regretted having caused the accident, and deplored the same.

Mr. BACHMANN. How far did Crim live from the town where Federal court was being held?

Mr. WRIGHT. About 40 miles.

Mr. BACHMANN. Is it likely he would not know the officials who were connected with the court, either the court crier or the bailiff?

Mr. WRIGHT. He might not know them under the circumstances. These officials came from Atlanta, Ga., which is the seat of the court, Columbus being simply a division of the court. They would go down to court and stay there during the session.

Mr. BACHMANN. In his own statement, made after he was shot, he said he did not know who the man was that came in there.

Mr. WRIGHT. He would not have known these people.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I will tell the gentleman from my own knowledge of the case that these men were from the office of the United States marshal in Atlanta.

The reason I happen to know about it is that in the first part of 1917, shortly after this happened, I became chief deputy in the United States marshal's office. I am familiar with the facts about it from talking with the marshal himself. I think the report is substantially correct. My recollection is the marshal told me those facts.

Mr. BACHMANN. Was there no police record kept of this man being killed there in the Federal building? Did not the police headquarters in this town have a record of it?

Mr. WRIGHT. No; there was no occasion for it.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I could not answer that question, because I was not present.

Mr. BACHMANN. Would they not investigate how the man met his death?

Mr. WRIGHT. They admit it. There is no question about it.

Mr. BACHMANN. Do you not have a coroner's inquest to determine the cause of death?

Mr. WRIGHT. Not when there are eyewitnesses to the occurrence. In Georgia, where they have eyewitnesses, they do not have a coroner's inquest.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. Certainly.

Mr. SCHAFER. I imagine that if it were a case of selling a pint of beer or a pint of whisky they would have a record going back 25 years.

Mr. MOUSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WRIGHT. Certainly.

Mr. MOUSER. I have asked the gentleman to yield in order to explain what might be an apparent inconsistency in my position. When this bill was first reported I objected. When it was first brought to my attention I discussed the facts with the gentleman from West Virginia. He had a doubt in his mind as to whether or not there was actual negligence on the part of an agent of the Government or a servant of the Government as distinguished from a pure accident. In view of the additional information given by the gentleman from Georgia I am convinced that I might have been in error and I therefore do not object at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to Mary F. Crim, of Manchester, Ga., widow of the late J. M. Crim, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000. Such sum shall be in full settlement of all claims against the United States on account of the death of the said late J. M. Crim. While in attendance at the United States District Court for the northern district of Georgia, western division, on May 8, 1917, the said late J. M. Crim received a bullet wound which resulted in his death, on account of the discharge of a pistol, caused by an attendant or crier of such court: Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment. On page 1, in line 6, strike out "$10,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,000."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON: Page 1, line 6, strike out "$10,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

RELIEF OF THE LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF COBB, BLASDELL & CO.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2026, for the relief of the legal representatives of Cobb, Blasdell & Co.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. CANFIELD. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. I will withhold my objection, but there is nothing the gentleman can bring to my attention to stop me from objecting to the consideration of this bill, which involves the payment of approximately $300,000 on an old, hoary Civil War claim for oats and wheat. There may also be barley in it. I think a bill of this size should not be taken up under unanimous consent.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

JACOB LANDRY

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2418, concerning the claim of Jacob Landry.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to section 33, township 10 south, range 2 east, St. Helena meridian, Ascension Parish, La., containing 232.75 acres, as shown on a plat of survey made by August P. Pheps, deputy surveyor, approved on April 14, 1851, by R. W. Boyd, surveyor general for the district of Louisiana, and segregated thereon as the claim of Jacob Landry, be, and the same are hereby, released, relinquished, and confirmed by the United States to the equitable owners of the equitable title thereto and to their respective heirs and assigns forever, as fully and completely, in every respect whatever, as could be done by patents issued according to law: Provided, That this act shall amount only to a relinquishment of any title that the United States has, or is supposed to have, in and to any of said lands, and shall not be construed to abridge, impair, injure, prejudice, or divert in any manner any valid right, title, or interest of any person or body corporate whatever; the true intent of this act being to concede and abandon all right, title, and interest of the United States to those persons, estates, firms, or corporations who would be the equitable owners of said lands, by reasons of long continuous possession under color of title with claim of ownership, or otherwise, under the laws of Louisiana, including the laws of prescription and limitation, in the absence of the said interest, title, and estate of the United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

VALIDATING CERTAIN APPLICATIONS FOR AND ENTRIES OF PUBLIC LANDS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 7674, validating certain applications for and entries of public lands, and for other purposes.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to find out what the total cost to the Government of the United States will be if this bill is passed.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. It is my understanding there will be no cost whatever.

Mr. SCHAFER. Are there any oil or minerals in the land in question? I see there is no reservation of any oil or mineral rights.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I do not know, and I am not prepared to say. The bill comes from the Interior Department, and they advise me there are four entries which ought to be patented, but for some technical reason they can not patent them.

Mr. SCHAFER. In these other bills, where we legalize these entries, there is a reservation with reference to mineral and oil rights. Why should they not be included in this bill?

Mr. ARENTZ. They should be.

Mr. SCHAFER. Unless an amendment is prepared to that effect I am going to object.

Mr. COLTON. If the gentleman will permit, I think he will find that the Government now includes those reservations in all of these entries. These are cases that arise during the administration of the Land Office each year. The equities are all with the entrymen; but because of technicalities in the law, title can not be granted; and they send omnibus bills of this kind every year and ask us to pass them.

Mr. SCHAFER. Why should we not carry a reservation of the mineral and oil rights in this bill the same as in other bills?

Mr. ARENTZ. That is perfectly right. We should do that.

Mr. COLTON. There is no objection to it.

Mr. SCHAFER. There is one more question I would like to ask. What is the effect of section 4, where you are taking away something from the Wasco County Electric & Water Power Co., without making any mention in the committee report as to the reason for that action. I notice that section 4 takes back the right of way that was granted to this company under the act of March 3, 1875.

Mr. ARENTZ. If the gentleman will read the sixth line from the bottom on page 3, he will find that:

The forfeiture of the grant would remove the cloud from the lands crossed by the right of way, and such action by the Congress is recommended.

Mr. SCHAFER. Does the Wasco County Electric & Water Power Co. need this right of way?

Mr. ARENTZ. Absolutely not, because the right of way is forfeited so as to remove the cloud on the title.

Mr. SCHAFER. But that does not answer my question. When you remove the cloud on the title, and give some citizen of this country title to the land, I do not want to approve a bill that is going to take something away from another citizen, be it an individual or a corporation.

Mr. ARENTZ. In view of the fact that the right of way was asked for, the road never built, and no construction work ever done, it is necessary——

Mr. SCHAFER. If that is the fact, and I am sure it is because the gentleman tells us so——

Mr. ARENTZ. I will read it.

Mr. SCHAFER. No; that is not necessary. When the gentleman makes a statement, I know it is correct. If the gentleman will offer the usual provision reserving the oil and mineral rights to the Government, I shall not object.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I have no objection to such an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to substitute a similar Senate bill, S. 3111.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

S. 3111

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to allow Edward L. Dailey, of Priest River, Idaho, to make entry under section 7 of the enlarged homestead act (36 Stat. L. 531), for the east half of southwest quarter, southwest quarter of southwest quarter, south half of northwest quarter of southwest quarter, south half of north half of northwest quarter of southwest quarter, northeast quarter of northeast quarter of northwest quarter of southwest quarter, southeast quarter of southeast quarter of northwest quarter, and south half of southwest quarter of southeast quarter of northwest quarter, section 24, township 57 north, range 5 west, Boise meridian, Idaho, within the limits of Kaniksu National Forest, restored to entry under the provisions of the act of June 11, 1906 (34 Stat. L. 233).

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to accept final proof submitted by Eugene Johnson on December 27, 1929, in support of his homestead entry, Santa Fe, N. Mex., No. 054594, made on November 8, 1926, for lots 1 and 2, and south half of the northeast quarter, section 4, township 3 north, range 14 west, New Mexico principal meridian, and to issue patent upon payment therefor at the rate of $1.25 per acre.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue patent upon isolated-tract application, Evanston, Wyo., No. 017020, filed by John Arambel on February 18, 1930, for the south half of the northeast quarter, section 17, township 24 north, range 106 west, sixth principal meridian, which was purchased by him at the appraised price of $3 per acre, under the provisions of section 2455 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, and on which cash certificate issued on April 11, 1930.

SEC. 4. That the right of way under the act of March 3, 1875 (18 Stat. L. 482), granted to the Wasco County Electric & Water Power Co. from a point in section 10, township 4 south, range 21 east, Willamette meridian, to a point in section 34, township 9 south, range 20 east, Willamette meridian, Oregon, be, and the same is hereby forfeited.

Mr. ARENTZ. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment as an additional section to the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ARENTZ: Page 3, at the end of the bill insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 5. Patent issued hereunder shall contain a reservation, in the usual form, of all oil, gas, and other minerals to the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill, H. R. 7674, was laid on the table.

P. JEAN DES GARENNES

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1420, for the relief of P. Jean des Garennes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I am against the growing practice of picking out favored individuals here and there and granting them pensions, when you do not grant pensions to all other persons of the same age and circumstances. Such favoritism must stop.

The only service this man ever rendered the Government was while holding a nice comfortable remunerative position as teacher for 28 years in the Naval Academy and receiving $4,500 a year for it. Why should we pension him and not pension all other faithful teachers? If we are going to pension this man, we ought to pick out every other man and woman in the United States who has taught 28 years, and there are several hundred thousand of them in the United States, and pension all of them.

Mr. GAMBRILL. Let me say to the gentleman from Texas that this man did teach 28 years, and he is now 84 years of age.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; and there are lots of similar cases where such teachers as faithful as he was do not receive any pension. I am against picking out the wives of former Presidents and granting them a pension when they are worth, perhaps, several hundred thousand dollars. I am against all such practices.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SCHAFER. I notice when the bill granting Mrs. Woodrow Wilson a pension of $5,000 a year as long as she lives was on the Consent Calendar the gentleman did not object.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is mistaken. I have objected to all such bills. I blocked the bill to grant a pension to Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt and the one for Mrs. Warren G. Harding and the one for Mrs. Woodrow Wilson just as long as one objection could stop them.

Mr. SCHAFER. How did the bill pass, then?

Mr. BLANTON. I was not here in Congress when that bill was passed granting a pension to Mrs. Woodrow Wilson. That passed during the interim that I was out of Congress.

Mr. BACHMANN. The gentleman from Texas was not a Member of the Congress at that time?

Mr. BLANTON. I was not here at the time that bill passed. I objected to every one that was presented while I was here and blocked them in each Congress as long as one man could block them.

Mr. SCHAFER. My recollection is that the gentleman was here, because I was tempted to object myself; but when the gentleman did not object, I did not.

Mr. BLANTON. No; the gentleman is entirely mistaken. If the gentleman will look up the record he will find I objected to every one of those special bills granting pensions to widows of deceased Presidents, who were all financially well fixed. I am uncompromisingly against showing such favoritism.

I object to this bill, Mr. Speaker.

DAVID J. MAHONEY

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1853, authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to advance on the retired list of the Navy David J. Mahoney, retired, to chief boiler maker, retired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

FREDERICK L. CAUDLE

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2125, to provide for the advancement on the retired list of the Navy of Frederick L. Caudle.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman to withhold his objection a moment?

Mr. STAFFORD. I withhold it.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. In the Seventy-first Congress there was a similar bill, and I had an opportunity to meet the objection of the gentleman. It was a bill of exactly the same character. It was the case of a man who was sent to the Fitzsimons Hospital about the time the Navy rule was changed as to when a man would be given an additional grade in his rank in the Navy. This man immediately upon receipt at the hospital was examined by the board and was then given retirement instead of keeping him there for a 90-day period before the retirement date became effective. In this case, had the retirement not been made shortly after his entrance in the hospital, the grade asked for in this bill would have become effective and the claimant would have received the benefit of it.

At that time, in the Seventy-first Congress, there were three cases; one was passed, and the gentleman from Wisconsin withdrew his objection. I trust he will do so in this case. I think under the circumstances this bill should be passed. In the last Congress it was passed in the Senate.

Mr. STAFFORD. The report shows the reason why this character of legislation should not be passed, and therefore I object.

ANNIE BRUCE

The Clerk read the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 2686, granting six months' pay to Annie Bruce.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the appropriation "Pay of the Navy, 1932," to Annie Bruce, widow of the late Lieut. Frank Bruce, United States Navy, an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate said Frank Bruce was receiving at the date of his death.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the bill, to obtain some information. This bill was reported out by the Naval Affairs Committee, and contains an appropriation. Under the rules of the House, the Naval Affairs Committee has no authority to appropriate, notwithstanding the fact that the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee has indicated that a certain class of bills carrying appropriations reported out by the Claims Committee, which has authority to appropriate, would be objected to, because they are not referred to the Foreign Affairs Committee, which has no authority to appropriate.

Mr. SWING. Does the gentleman make that as an argument against this case?

Mr. SCHAFER. I intended to object to this bill, but the unanimous-consent proceedings went through so fast that I did not hear the Chair ask for an objection. I want to find out why this bill has singled out this beneficiary to pay her six months of a lieutenant's pay.

Mr. SWING. Has the gentleman read the report? The report of the Navy Department sets forth completely why. There is a favorable report made by both the Navy Department and the committee. The bill was passed by the House in the last Congress, but was not reached in the Senate. It is a most meritorious bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER. I would yield, but I want to get some information, and the gentleman from California, the author of the bill, has not given me that information. If he does not want to give the information, we will have to have a quorum here if the bill is to be passed.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think it is the farthest thought of the gentleman from California to be sarcastic, knowing that he is appealing to the grace of any Member when there is not a quorum present.

Mr. SCHAFER. If my distinguished colleague from Wisconsin can give me the information which I desire and show why this bill should pass——

Mr. STAFFORD. The existing law provides for the payment of six months' gratuity to the dependents of all naval officers when they die in service. There was a short interim when that law was repealed. This provides a gratuity for an officer who died during that interim when the law was not in force.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is this the only naval officer that would come under these circumstances?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, no; we have passed as many as 10 of these bills where naval officers died during that period, because it was the established policy prior to the repeal to pay the dependents of such officers who died in the service, and is the law to-day.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, in view of the facts given by my colleague from Wisconsin, I will not object to the passage of the bill and will not raise a point of no quorum.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

DAVID ALBERT ROBESON

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2695) for the relief of David Albert Robeson.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to accept for enlistment in the Navy, without regard to physical or other qualifications, David Albert Robeson, formerly chief yeoman, United States Navy and United States Fleet Naval Reserve, in the rating held by him when last discharged and to transfer him immediately to the Fleet Naval Reserve in that rating: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

GEORGE W. STEELE, JR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6336) for the relief of George W. Steele, jr.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, in order to get some information from the author.

Mr. GAMBRILL. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill introduced by me at the request of the Navy Department. I have no interest in it outside of that. It is to correct the accounts of Captain Steele, who was a military attaché at Paris. Five naval officers were detailed in 1928 to go to Paris, France, and to Spain, for the purpose of perfecting themselves in the language of those countries. They were under orders to go there, and under orders were allowed $6 per diem. The amount was paid, $1,674, by Captain Steele. When his accounts came before the Comptroller General they were disallowed on the ground that the officers were entitled to only subsistence allowance, which, I believe, amounts to about 60 cents a day. These officers were required to go to Spain and to France. They were under orders to go there and were allowed the $6 a day.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is a pretty nice pleasure trip—to go at the direction of the Navy on a jaunt through France and Spain.

Mr. GAMBRILL. They were instructors at the Naval Academy at Annapolis, and were instructed to go to France and Spain in order to perfect themselves in the languages of those countries.

Mr. STAFFORD. Nevertheless, it was during the summer-vacation period, was it not?

Mr. GAMBRILL. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. And that is the time when they enjoy their vacations.

Mr. GAMBRILL. Oh, no; that is the only time that they can get away from the Naval Academy.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why was not the position of the comptroller correct in refusing this $6 per day allowance?

Mr. GAMBRILL. The gentleman must know himself that one can not live in Spain and France on 60 cents a day. The allowance of $6 a day was a reasonable allowance.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I had this bill marked for objection, but the gentleman from Maryland has presented facts which causes me to withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. This bill properly should have been sent to the Committee on Claims. It is about time that the Naval Affairs Committee, of which the author of this bill is a member, stops usurping the jurisdiction of the Claims Committee. However, this is a meritorious bill, and I shall not object, but I suggest in the future where there are bills that should go to the Claims Committee that the gentleman send them there.

Mr. GAMBRILL. Mr. Speaker, I have nothing to do with sending bills to different committees.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to credit the accounts of George W. Steele, jr., captain, United States Navy, in the sum of $1,674, representing payments made by him to five officers of the Navy in accordance with orders of the Navy Department, which payments were disallowed by the Comptroller General.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

J. N. GORDON

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8777) for the relief of J. N. Gordon.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to adjust and settle the claim of J. N. Gordon, arising out of the relinquishment of certain lands included in mineral entry, Denver, numbered 040111, for which the payments had theretofore been made, and to allow said claim in the amount of $382.50 in full and final settlement thereof.

SEC. 2. To enable the Comptroller General to carry out the provisions of this act there is hereby appropriated, out of that subdivision of the Confederated Bands of Utes 4 per cent fund to which the same was heretofore credited, the sum of $382.50 to pay this claim.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I do this to call the attention of the Members present to-night to the way this calendar has operated. The other day we worked under the new rule that the House adopted to handle the Private Calendar. We consumed over two hours' time and considered 13 bills under that new rule. Three of those bills were passed. In two hours' time to-night we have considered 33 bills, 22 of which have been passed favorably and 11 objected to.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHMANN. Yes.

Mr. RAMSPECK. It might be well to state those bills that we considered under the new rule had previously been objected to under this procedure.

Mr. BACHMANN. That was the understanding, and that is the reason we should have made more time. It is quite evident from the way the House is considering the Private Calendar to-night that if we are going to clean up the bills that are on this Private Calendar before the adjournment of this session we ought to follow the rule of unanimous consent, such as we have followed to-night, and not go back to a proceeding under the new rule that some Members of the House thought would expedite the handling of bills on the Private Calendar.

Many of us are interested in these private bills. It is clearly evident that the proper and practical way to handle them is the way they have been handled under this unanimous-consent proceeding to-night. I hope during the rest of the session when the Private Calendar is being considered we will proceed under the unanimous-consent rule, as we have to-night, instead of under the new rule that was adopted by the House.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

I agree exactly with what the gentleman from West Virginia has said. We can not improve much on the old rules of this House. They are the result of a hundred years of study by men who have been just as smart as we are. If we want to pass the good bills, we had better take steps at once to abolish this new rule, which is unworkable, and go back to the old rule.

I am sorry we are about to lose the most valuable part of the very valuable services of the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. BACHMANN, in this House. His being drafted by our Republican friends as minority whip is a distinct loss to the country. He has been taken away from us and put into a political job. Up to this time he has been one of the most valuable men in the House. He has not only helped us in watching the Private Calendar and the Consent Calendar with a great deal of success, and blocking bad bills, but he has been active here in helping us to frame all kinds of important legislation, and he rendered distinctive service on the Fish committee to stop the growth of communism in the United States. I am sorry we are about to lose him from active legislative service. Since he has been made Republican whip, from now on his time will be taken up mostly with politics. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. MOUSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. MOUSER. I agree with all the gentleman from Texas has said about the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. BACHMANN]; but I might add that, as a result of the great experience over long service in this House of the present occupant of the chair, the distinguished majority floor leader, we have been able to expedite the business of the evening. [Applause.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

C. M. WILLIAMSON AND OTHERS

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, S. 458, for the relief of C. M. Williamson, Mrs. Tura Liljenquist, administratrix of C. E. Liljenquist, deceased, Lottie Redman, and H. N. Smith.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill, No. 260 on the calendar, S. 458, is identical with H. R. 4393, which is at present No. 144 on the deferred calendar. This bill was given a great deal of consideration before the House at the previous hearing, and I object.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman reserve his objection for a moment?

Mr. GRISWOLD. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I am sorry the gentleman takes this attitude, because this is certainly a very meritorious bill. This is a Senate bill and is identical with one that was introduced and reported favorably in the House not only in this session but in previous sessions. We feel that these people, for whose relief this legislation has been introduced, are entitled to favorable consideration, because they in good faith entered upon the land which was supposed to be irrigable by gravity, but as the Government progressed with the development of the irrigation project, it was found that these lands were on a knoll and they could not be irrigated by gravity, and consequently the water was not furnished them, although the Government collected maintenance and operation each year for furnishing the water which they did not furnish.

The entrymen, while waiting for the Government to put water on the higher land, bought power plants and paid a power company a vast amount, over $5,000, over a period of nine years. Then the Government, realizing that they had contracts with these individual entrymen, put in a siphon which enabled them to bring the water by gravity to these lands. These entrymen have acted in good faith, and the Government had a contract with them to furnish water and did not do it. This is for the relief of these people during the time they had to put the water there at their own expense.

Mr. MOUSER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I yield.

Mr. MOUSER. I have carefully investigated this report and I can not help but agree with the report of the Committee on Claims, that this is a clear violation of a contract with the Government. The question arises, and it is broader than the amount involved, whether or not the United States Government, which can not be sued because of its sovereignty, is to be permitted to take advantage of that sovereignty by not recognizing these claims against it. The original report showed that this land was irrigable, and properly classified as such, and these people relied upon this contract to obtain water for the purpose of carrying on their farming activities. The Government violated the contract, and these people were compelled to purchase the water.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOUSER. I yield if I have the floor.

Mr. BLANTON. The Indian Commissioner says:

It would appear from the foregoing that the Government is not under obligation to pay these landowners for the sums expended by them in constructing and operating their pump machinery for their own benefit.

And Hon. Lyman Wilbur, Secretary of the Interior, says:

I can not recommend the passage of this bill.

What has the gentleman to say about that?

Mr. MOUSER. This question is broader than mere argument as to who should do the pumping. These people were deprived of their water, and I agree with the report of the committee, from the facts, as against the report of the bureau. The interest has been eliminated. Clearly, in a civil court, they would have been granted that interest. I know the gentleman is fair enough and a good enough lawyer to understand that.

Mr. FRENCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOUSER. I yield.

Mr. FRENCH. And during all this period these claimants were paying their annual assessment charges to the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. And they were making no claim whatsoever for installing the machinery.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, we can handle one of the gentlemen from Idaho, but not both of them at the same time.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, I think the claim is meritorious.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I object to the bill.

WILLIAM J. NOWINSKI

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1346, for the relief of William J. Nowinski.

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

LIEUT. COMMANDER CORNELIUS DUGAN

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2839, for the relief of Lieut. Commander Cornelius Dugan, retired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I object.

MINNIE HOPKINS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3624, for the relief of Minnie Hopkins.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Minnie Hopkins, mother of Farris Carlton Hopkins, seaman, first class, United States Navy, who was killed by an explosion on the U. S. S. Mississippi, June 12, 1924, is hereby allowed an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate Farris Carlton Hopkins was receiving at the date of his death: Provided, That the said Minnie Hopkins establishes to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy the fact that she was actually dependent upon her son, the late Farris Carlton Hopkins, at the time of his death.

SEC. 2. That the payment of the amount of money allowed and authorized to be paid to the said Minnie Hopkins is authorized to be made from the appropriation "Pay, subsistence, and transportation of Navy revenue."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

JOE G. M'INERNEY

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4226, for the relief of Joe G. McInerney.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the gentleman withhold his objection.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Yes.

Mr. McMILLAN. I do not know the reason the gentleman objects to this bill if the gentleman has read the report. The report shows that neither the Treasury Department nor the Navy Department has anything at all against this man's record.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. The man was dishonorably discharged, and because the records happen to be unavailable at the present time is no basis for such a statement.

Mr. McMILLAN. The records are not unavailable at the present time. The commandant of the Coast Guard says his office has no record of any dishonorable discharge.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. The man has his own dishonorable discharge, and the report so states.

Mr. McMILLAN. Yes; but let me tell the gentleman from Colorado exactly what has happened.

I have here a letter from the commanding officer of the ship. It is in the report. Here is a photostatic copy of a letter written three days after the man was discharged by the assistant engineer in charge of the ship on which he served, which I just received from him the other day:

This is to certify Joseph McInerney served as oiler on this vessel for the past 12 months. During that entire period on the Forward I have found him to be intelligent, industrious, willing, obedient, respectful, and never under the influence of liquor. Great pleasure is therefore taken in recommending him to any person or firm needing the services of such a man.

That is signed by Charles A. Root, assistant engineer of this ship.

I know this gentleman. I have known him 20 years. His reputation is unquestioned by anybody who knows him in my city.

I hope the gentleman from Colorado will not object unless he can show good grounds.

I will say to the gentleman from Colorado that the discharge was given him because of the fact that inadvertently, and he says that in his letter, he failed to salute an officer as he was coming off the ship. This is the cause of the discharge. This is the only ground on which the action was taken against him.

When the department has no record of any reason to the contrary why such a thing as that should exist, I hope the gentleman will not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe the gentleman will have no objection to the customary saving clause that no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act?

Mr. McMILLAN. That is provided in the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not in the customary phraseology.

Mr. McMILLAN. No; I have no objection to it.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, or benefits upon persons honorably discharged from the United States Coast Guard, their widows, children, and dependent relatives, Joe G. McInerney shall be held and considered to have been discharged under honorable conditions as a coal heaver from the cutter Forward on December 13, 1902; but no pay or bounty shall be held to have accrued prior to the date of the enactment of this act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: On line 9, strike out the semicolon and the remainder of lines 9 and 10, insert a colon, and add the following: "Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

ROSCOE M'KINLEY MEADOWS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4271, for the relief of Roscoe McKinley Meadows.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. MONTAGUE. There are several bills of this particular character which have been passed, and several passed when the gentleman himself was present.

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not think there have been several, although there may have been one. I went over this very carefully, and I have no question but what it is objectionable, to my way of thinking.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman will notice that General Hines states:

From a review of all the evidence of record, it would appear that Mr. Meadows may be equitably entitled to some relief, but under the existing interpretations of law, you will realize that it is impossible for his case to be considered under the emergency officers' retirement act.

So he is between the upper and nether millstone. He could not be a regular officer nor could he come under the retirement act.

Mr. STAFFORD. He was a chaplain in the service?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. And now wishes to be retired at a high salary. I will say to my friend from Virginia that I have taken this position in the Committee on Military Affairs with reference to bills of a similar character.

Mr. MONTAGUE. The gentleman has objected to some bills, but I notice he did not object to others.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish the gentleman would call my attention to a case where I have even squinted at recognizing this policy.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I called the gentleman's attention to this bill once before.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will go over it again, but according to my present way of thinking I am strongly opposed to it. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ROLAND BALDWIN ESTEP

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5011, for the relief of Roland Baldwin Estep, deceased.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I object.

CHARLES W. EATON

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6765, for the relief of Charles W. Eaton.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN UNITED STATES NAVAL OFFICERS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1383, for the relief of certain United States naval officers.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in construing the laws governing travel and travel allowances of naval personnel the travel performed by Ensigns R. E. Van Meter, F. M. Adamson, S. C. Anderson, G. H. Deiter, Paul Foley, jr., H. J. Hiemenz, C. V. Ricketts, C. E. Weakley, M. B. Wyatt, and F. R. Duborg; Midshipmen P. L. deVos, P. C. Evans, W. C. Ennis, D. W. Gladney, J. H. Hean, and H. M. Heiser, incident to their appearance December 7, 1929, before the State Committees of Selection for Rhodes Scholarships, under orders of the Navy Department, shall be held and considered to have been performed on public business and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized and directed to pay them travel allowances therefor from the current appropriation, "Pay, subsistence, and transportation, Navy."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

NOLEN N. REYNOLDS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1907, for the relief of Nolen N. Reynolds.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged sailors, Nolen N. Reynolds, who served as a fireman, third class, United States Navy, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the naval service of the United States on June 6, 1922: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

JOSEPH B. LYNCH

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3420, for the relief of Joseph B. Lynch.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. DALLINGER. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will.

Mr. DALLINGER. There is a favorable report from the Navy Department on this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are many favorable reports from the Navy Department on questionable bills.

Mr. DALLINGER. This is a case where this man filed his application but they lost his application in the Navy Department. The report says:

In view of the fact that Lieutenant Lynch requested reenrollment within four months of the date of the expiration of his previous enrollment, and that he was not reenrolled from any fault of his own, the committee feels that his request should be granted.

Then there is a letter from the Secretary of the Navy. It was entirely the fault of the Navy Department and they admit it.

Mr. STAFFORD. This man was in the Naval Reserve. Within four months of the expiration of his first service he applied for reenrollment and there was nothing heard from his application until two years later. You are now asking to have him granted privileges as if he had been enrolled at the time of his original application.

Mr. DALLINGER. He should have been enrolled.

Mr. STAFFORD. But, in fact, he was not, and now you are asking to give him pay for the time he did not serve. Mr. Speaker, I object.

MICHAEL F. CALNAN

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3422, for the relief of Michael F. Calnan.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. This is another bill introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, this man, so far as fighting is concerned, had a splendid record. Whenever there was any fighting going on during the Boxer insurrection or in the Philippines he was right there, but he did have one failing. He sometimes drank too much; but in view of the fact that his military record is all right, so far as fighting is concerned, it does seem that he might have his record corrected.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, perhaps, as a liberal who has voted consistently for modification of the prohibition enforcement act to correct intolerable conditions, I should take a more liberal attitude, particularly with the gentleman, who is invariably dry—not dripping dry, but arid dry—from classic Cambridge and from an institution which is supposed to graduate persons of liberal thought. Here we find that this man committed many offenses in being absent without leave and drinking, culminating in a summary court-martial for absence without leave.

Mr. DALLINGER. All this occurred when there was not any fighting going on. He had four years of service.

Mr. STAFFORD. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, this man had a fighting spirit like Bob Evans, who never considered any man to have proper fighting qualities unless he could take a drink. I think this man does not represent the type that the sponsor of this bill represents. Therefore he was a good fighting man, and I withdraw my objection. [Laughter and applause.]

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws Michael F. Calnan shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States in the Marine Corps: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed; and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ROSCOE M'KINLEY MEADOWS

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 265, the bill (H. R. 4271) for the relief of Roscoe McKinley Meadows, introduced by our colleague the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE]. I want to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin a question in connection with the bill.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is the beneficiary of this bill a drinking man also?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I shall be pleased to go over this bill again, but for the time being, I object.

ROBERT J. WHITE

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 3426, for the relief of Robert J. White.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, here is another installment by the gentleman from Massachusetts, from the classic shades of Cambridge. I would like to have some explanation of this bill, because I have it marked provisionally for objection. Is this a drinking man also?

Mr. DALLINGER. No. I may state, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. White, anxious to serve his country, enlisted in the Navy in the only way he could at the time. A week after he had enlisted in the regular Navy the Congress passed an act whereby men could enlist as emergency officers. This man was overseas and was injured. As a result of the injury which he received in the service he had to submit to an operation and one of his kidneys was removed.

This matter went before the Veterans' Bureau, and he was recommended for retirement under the emergency officers' retirement act, and then the Comptroller General raised the technical point that he had enlisted in the Regular Navy. This man was an emergency officer, and so understood it, and when the war was over he resigned.

It seems to me this is an exceptionally good case for retirement, and I do not believe that this technical objection raised by the Comptroller General should stand in the way of his being retired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I have examined the report while the gentleman from Massachusetts has been expatiating upon the service of this good man, and I recall I have objected to similar bills, and I therefore object.

RALPH M'ALPIN

The Clerk read the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 4311, for the relief of Ralph McAlpin.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the department recommends against this bill, and I object.

LYDIA C. SPRY

The Clerk read the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 971, granting insurance to Lydia C. Spry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, will some member of the Committee on Claims explain this bill?

Mr. SCHAFER. If the gentleman will yield, this is a bill I questioned in the Claims Committee because it involved the payment of war-risk insurance to the beneficiary. I reserved the right to file a minority report and sent for the case folder to check the record. This man was in the service and designated that deductions be made from his pay to take care of the war-risk insurance.

He was temporarily out of the service for a short time and then reentered the service. The Navy Department could not find the record of the filing of the application and the designation that deductions be made from his pay.

However, he was entitled to additional pay by reason of the second enlistment, which pay he had not received. He no doubt was under the impression the additional pay was not received because it was being used to pay his insurance premiums.

The Government owed him this additional money for the reenlistment, which was approximately the amount of the premium which is deductible for war-risk insurance premiums.

In the case of war-risk insurance, if the insurance lapses and later it is found that the beneficiary had uncollected compensation due him, there is an automatic reinstatement of the insurance.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Why did not the gentleman get the file?

Mr. SCHAFER. I did get the file, and went through it. If the facts in the folders had not justified favorable action, I would have filed a minority report.

Mr. BLANTON. Why did not they get the report from the department and put the recommendations into the report?

Mr. SCHAFER. I could not tell the gentleman. I did not write the report.

Mr. BLANTON. When there is no report from the department, especially in a case like this that called for $8,000 paid to a private individual, I shall always object. There ought to be a recommendation from the department in every report that is filed, and where there is not, I shall object. I object.

LOTTIE NAYLOR

The Clerk called the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 1406, for the relief of Lottie Naylor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MOUSER. I object.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 26, 1932, at 12 o'clock noon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the approval of the Journal of the calendar days of Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, May 23, 24, and 25.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONSIDERATION OF AGRICULTURAL RELIEF BILLS

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I desire to submit a unanimous-consent request which will involve determination of a time to vote. May I ask whether the parliamentary situation is one now, following the roll call which has just been recorded, which would permit the submission of that request without the call of another quorum?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If it involves a final vote, there would have to be another roll call, or it could be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. NYE. I am going to submit at this time a unanimous-consent proposal, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let it be reported for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from North Dakota proposes that when the Senate has voted upon the passage of the pending tax bill, the bills, S. 4536, by Mr. MCNARY, and S. 1197, by Mr. FRAZIER, shall, in the stated order, be laid before the Senate and shall not be laid aside, except by unanimous consent, until a vote shall have been recorded upon the question of the passage of the bills.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, of course, I am very greatly interested in the early consideration of those measures, one of which I reported yesterday, but in view of the parliamentary situation and the very careful program arranged by the steering committee I would not want any bill to which my name is attached to interfere with that program, and presently I shall object to any change in the program.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will withhold his objection for just a moment. While he has stated why he should feel it incumbent upon him to object, I want to state why I am making the request.

I make the request out of a desire to expedite, if I can, the passage of the pending tax bill. Yet if we are to have a demonstration and a pretty virtual assurance that there is going to be no vote during the present session on any of the pending farm bills, then I must insist upon my amendment which I have offered, and which is on the desk as an amendment to the pending tax bill, which relates to the measure introduced by the Senator from Oregon and which he has reported to the Senate within the last two days. So I would like to renew the request and ask unanimous consent for such a proposal as has been sent to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I hope it will be provided that it shall not interfere with the consideration of appropriation bills. All those bills should be passed by the 1st of July.

Mr. NYE. I understand that there is no interference at all with an appropriation bill by reason of such a unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. JONES. Does the Senator understand that that is the way the unanimous-consent request is to be construed? I merely heard it read and it seems to me it would prevent the consideration of appropriation bills. I have no objection to the Senator's proposition otherwise. I think as soon as the tax bill is disposed of, the appropriation bills should be disposed of as rapidly as possible.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, may I remind the Senator from Washington that one of the appropriation bills contains the so-called economy measure which came over from the other House and which ought to be considered at the very earliest possible opportunity in order that the other appropriation bills may be properly drawn in connection with whatever the Senate does with that bill.

Mr. JONES. I have that in mind, and it is necessary that we pass the appropriation bills and that they should not be delayed.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from North Dakota how does his proposal fit in with the program which we have been trying to follow as it came from the steering committee?

Mr. NYE. It will not fit in at all so long as the steering committee denies to agriculture the assurance of consideration.

I understand, Mr. President, that it will be altogether advantageous to withdraw my proposal at this time in anticipation that within a few hours there may be some agreement reached. I want to say that if there should be a failure in obtaining unanimous consent, then I shall propose, following that, a unanimous-consent agreement that the Congress shall not adjourn until there has been a vote upon one or the other or both of the pending agricultural measures which are now on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from North Dakota withdraws his request.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. TYDINGS presented a resolution adopted by Glen Burnie Post, No. 40, the American Legion, department of Maryland, favoring the elimination or reduction of the interest rate on loans to veterans on adjusted-service certificates, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COPELAND presented a resolution adopted by the Citizens' Forum of Columbia Heights, Washington, D. C., indorsing the principles embodied in old-age security legislation pending in Congress, and favoring the prompt enactment of an old-age security law for the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Young Men's Board of Trade, of New York City, N. Y., protesting against the passage of legislation tending to diminish, reduce, or hinder the present standard of efficiency of the Army, or the reduction of its personnel, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the administrators of the Mt. Vernon (N. Y.) school system, opposing the lowering of the present salary schedules of Government employees, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a letter in the nature of a petition, from Henry J. Nauss, manager of the Whitmer-Jackson Co., Inc., and signed by sundry citizens, all of Rochester, N. Y., praying for support of the program of President Hoover for the immediate balancing of the Budget and economies in Federal expenditures, and the defeat of all "unsound legislation calling for new bond issues or large expenditures," and so forth, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WHEELER presented a petition of sundry citizens of Anaconda, Deer Lodge County, Mont., praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. 1) to provide for the immediate payment to veterans of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REMONETIZATION OF SILVER

Mr. WHEELER presented the petition of Herman Dethman and sundry other citizens of Roosevelt County, Mont., which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD without the signatures, as follows:

WOLF POINT, MONT.

We, the undersigned citizens of Roosevelt County, Mont., believing that agriculture is one of our basic industries and that the economic security of our Nation is dependent upon the economic security of the American farm, favor such legislation as will provide for the solvency of the American farmer.

We believe that the only way out of the present depression is to raise commodity prices and thereby reduce the burden of debt. Under the present gold standard debts contracted three years ago, if paid this year, would require three times the amount in farm commodities as when they were contracted. All of the important countries of the world have gone off the gold standard except France; it is therefore impossible for us to trade with them. This keeps commodity prices down.

We feel that if prosperity is to return to this country we must go off the gold standard, which is the cause for most of our economic ills.

We therefore respectfully petition the Senate of the United States of America to pass the Wheeler silver bill, No. S. 2487, which provides for the remonetization of silver by providing for the free coinage of silver as well as gold at the fixed ratio of 16 to 1.

REDUCTION OF OFFICER PERSONNEL OF THE ARMY

Mr. DAVIS presented a resolution adopted by the Tri-County Reserve Officers' Association, Du Bois, Pa., which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas there has been introduced into the House of Representatives of Congress an act proposing to reduce the officer personnel of the Regular Army from 12,000 to 10,000 and to cut out various other features of the training of the Army, etc.; and

Whereas these matters have come to the attention of the Tri-County Reserve Officers' Association, composed of the counties of Clearfield, Elk, and Jefferson, in the State of Pennsylvania; and

Whereas said association at its regular meeting held at Punxsutawny, Tuesday, May 17, 1932, with representatives present from the Reserve Officers' Association of Indiana and Cambria Counties, and after fully discussing the proposed legislation have unanimously condemned the same as false governmental economy: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Tri-County Reserve Officers Association does hereby oppose the Collins bill for the reduction of officer personnel of the Regular Army from 12,000 to 10,000 with other reductions as contained in said bill. Said association heartily approved of the editorial appearing in the Philadelphia Public Ledger Sunday, May 15, 1932, opposing this legislation, which reads as follows:

"With the suppositious approval of the White House, the House of Representatives on Friday voted to reduce the officer personnel of the Regular Army from 12,000 to 10,000. This measure, which has been sponsored by Representative COLLINS of Mississippi, is a pernicious piece of false economy. Its purpose is pacifistic. Mr. COLLINS for years has had it 'in' for the Army. The savings effected would be negligible.

"An efficient force of highly trained officers would be the first essential in case of a national emergency. Such a force can not be improvised. Its existence might mean the difference between victory and defeat.

"This constant bearing down on the defense forces of the Nation has already gone much too far. It is time to check it before it reaches the point of inviting disaster. Those Representatives and Senators who have the best interests of the country at heart should have no hesitancy about voting this intolerable provision out of the War Department appropriation bill at the first opportunity"; and be it further

Resolved, That this association directs the secretary to forward copies of said resolution to Hon. DAVID A. REED, Hon. JAMES J. DAVIS, Hon. NATHAN L. STRONG, Hon. BANKS KURTZ, and other Members of Congress from Pennsylvania, urging their wholehearted opposition so that the above-mentioned proposed legislation shall not be passed by Congress.

Respectfully submitted.

TRI-COUNTY RESERVE OFFICERS ASSOCIATION,
By B. B. MCCREIGHT, President (and others).

REVENUE AND TAXATION—AMENDMENTS

Mr. JONES and Mr. HOWELL each submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to House bill 10236, the revenue and taxation bill, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, there is in the city of Washington what is known as the Filipino Club, composed largely of students attending our national colleges, men who are working their way through school and perfecting their education.

The president of this organization is Mr. Mauro Baradi, a fine student.

I have been requested, as a part of the Philippine discussion, to present their answer to an article by Mr. BACON, which has been given much publicity by imperialists and others who oppose the fulfillment of our national promise.

Friends of Philippine independence in the Senate do not desire to consume the time of the Senate while our domestic questions are pressing for solution; but I shall from time to time present matters which may be of interest to the Senate in connection with independence, so that when we finally reach a discussion of this subject the time consumed can be well limited.

I ask permission to insert in the body of the RECORD, as part of the discussion of the Philippines, the statement of these intelligent young Filipinos.

With possibly one exception, I do not know of a single Filipino who is opposing independence. This exception, however, is well exploited by the imperialists.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and to lie on the table, as follows:

INDEPENDENCE FOR THE PHILIPPINES

(By Mauro Baradi, president Filipino Club of Washington, D. C. (Inc.))

Recently American papers published an article on Freedom of the Philippines, written by Hon. ROBERT L. BACON, Congressman from New York. This same article was incorporated as part of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on May 9, 1932. Some of the arguments made by the Congressman against the grant of Philippine independence are that Philippine separation would mean "less work in our cotton mills, our cigarette factories, our steel mills, and in other industries"; that it would bring about "sanguinary conflict in the islands, for one-third of the area is possessed by approximately a million Moros, occupying what is known as the Mahometan territory"; and that independence means giving "other nations vitally interested in the Orient something else in the way of territory and resources to quarrel over, to covet, and to become the subject of international intrigue."

In an attempt to reply to these contentions, we desire to be as brief as possible.

THE GAG RULE ALIBI

Mr. BACON begins his article by saying that the Philippine independence bill (H. R. 7233) was passed by the House of Representatives "after only 40 minutes' debate, under a drastic gag rule." The Congressman should not raise this "gag rule" alibi, because when the chairman of the Committee on Insular Affairs [Mr. HARE] first brought up his independence bill, he asked unanimous consent which would have allowed a 2-hour debate, which was not granted because of Mr. BACON'S objection. Mr. HARE next asked that the bill be given a privileged status, with ample time for debate, which was likewise objected to by Mr. BACON. It was, therefore, taken up under a suspension of rules with limited debate. No better explanation can be given to Mr. BACON'S complaint than to quote from the remarks of two other Congressmen from New York appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Said Congressman LAGUARDIA: "The bill has been on the calendar, and this matter of raising the question now that to-day is Monday and some Members are absent, I do not believe is a justifiable argument to present, and I want to point out to my colleague that he is not interfering with the ultimate passage of this bill if we take it up to-day, and we might as well take it up under unanimous consent as to take it up under a rule. I can not reconcile the gentleman's position of suggesting that this is 'gag' and in the same breath recommending a rule. I hope my colleague will permit the House to resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. We can discuss it there and finally make good a solemn promise that is in the platform of both parties."

Hon. ANTHONY J. GRIFFIN, in a letter to one of his constituents explaining the "gag rule," said:

"Let me assure you that the 40-minute limitation on debate was brought about by the opponents of the bill in the hope that it might be killed. The chairman of the committee, through an understanding with the Speaker, designed to consider the bill under the rules, which would give two hours' debate. Under that method of consideration the bill only required a majority vote to secure passage. Realizing this, an opponent of the bill objected, so that it was incumbent upon the chairman of the committee to ask for consideration of the bill under unanimous consent. Under that parliamentary procedure only 40 minutes' debate is permissible, and it requires a two-thirds vote to pass the bill.

"Notwithstanding that the limitation of debate was brought about by their own actions, the opponents of the bill laid much stress during the debate on the brief time which was allowed for consideration; and I notice that the newspapers which opposed Philippine independence also emphasized the shortness of the debate * * *."

HUMAN FREEDOM VERSUS SELFISH INTERESTS

While respecting contrary opinions we consider it unfortunate that in the consideration of human rights affecting 13,000,000 souls, cotton mills, cigarette factories, and other industries should be given more weight. There may have been instances where the freedom of a people has been sacrificed on the altar of materialism and greed, but we prefer not to believe that such would happen to a nation comparatively small and weak from the hands of another, powerful and great. America's history and the traditions of her people would not countenance such a treatment.

It should be borne in mind that the Philippines is essentially an agricultural country and the United States a manufacturing country. Even if independent, the islands would still need cotton goods and manufactured articles such as automobiles, motor trucks and parts thereof, iron and steel manufactures, electrical machinery, chemicals, woolen goods, and others. America, on the other hand, needs from the archipelago things which she does not grow or produce, like cane sugar, copra, coconut oil, manila fiber, and the like. America is a temperate country and the Philippines, a tropical one. Philippine products in the main do not compete with those of the United States; on the contrary they are essentially supplementary and complementary.

Then, too, there have been, and there are still, various attempts on the part of powerful interests to have Congress pass a law excluding Filipinos from the United States. They contend that Filipinos are displacing American laborers, thus making the unemployment situation more acute. Congress decided that as long as the Philippines remain under the American flag it would be unfair, unjust, and un-American to prevent the Filipinos from entering continental United States. It is, therefore, apparent that prolonged control of the islands by America would not relieve the situation. By granting independence the United States could restrict, or perhaps even prevent, the Filipino laborer from entering America.

THE SO-CALLED MORO PROBLEM, A WORN-OUT BUGABOO

Way back during the fifteenth century a motto, "Divide et impera," was followed to the letter by monarchs. With the passing of the years, however, the oppressed, realizing the dire consequences of division in their ranks and the heavy penalties they had to pay for fighting one another, united as one man and fought, dethroned, yes, beheaded their oppressors, as a result of which liberal forms of government came into being.

The idea that independence would bring about "sanguinary conflict in the islands" is not new; neither is the allegation that the Moros will never submit to the rule of Christian Filipinos because of differences in language, customs, and religion a revelation. Spain used these arguments as an excuse for prolonging her stay in the islands only to find that the Moro fought side by side with his Christian Filipino brother in overthrowing the Spanish yoke; and this can be said at present when the Filipinos are fighting for their freedom no longer in the field of battle but in the realm of peace.

Six years ago Congressman BACON introduced a bill (H. R. 12772) calculated to dismember Philippine territory. This measure was opposed by Filipinos, Christians and Mohammedans alike.

The Congressman quoted in his article under consideration a Moro petition against independence: "That we (Moros) are loyal unto death to the United States." Who knows but that this petition is among those documents which former Governor General Forbes mentions in his book entitled "The Philippine Islands" as bearing "evidence of having been drafted by Americans and other foreign residents in the region * * *." A close student of Philippine affairs and himself a Member of the United States Senate, as well as a member of the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs, after an extended visit to the islands, records the following observation:

"American interposition discourages and delays personal contact and comity between the two great religious groups of the Philippines. There has never been any attempt by Christian Filipinos to interfere with the Mohammedan religion or to proselyte among the Mohammedans. Wherever the effort at converting the Moros to Christianity has been undertaken, its inspiration and furtherance have been wholly American. The Christian Filipino knows that the Moro menace has been exploited in the United States and that a romantic fiction has been spread by propaganda, the purpose being to retard independence, to put an impediment in its way."

This view is shared by impartial observers and those who have lived in the Philippines long enough to know the Filipinos as they are and not as others think they ought to be. "If religion is the barrier to complete understanding between the two elements," say our authorized Filipino leaders and spokesmen, "it is easy to see that the Mohammedan Filipinos would be as much distrustful of American Christians as they are of Filipino Christians. The real fact is that no such animosity exists, and that Mohammedan and Christian Filipinos, belonging as they do to the same race and conscious as they are of a common destiny, to-day feel that they are part of the same nation which it is their privilege and duty both to support and to govern." Then there is a written declaration of former Senator Hadji Butu, a Moro leader of great influence and power: "I can assure you that the people of Sulu are entirely satisfied with the actual state of affairs and always will be so if the government of Sulu should be intrusted to Filipino hands. * * * My people wish for and are in conformity with independence (of the Philippines), and when that is conceded, I can assure you that nothing will happen between the Moros and the Christians * * *." Prophets of Philippine disaster and internal bloody conflicts may hear the solid voice of representative Mohammedan Filipinos through a petition recently directed to the President of the United States, the Congress, and the American people, thus:

"Although we belong to the Mohammedan faith, we are Filipinos in blood and sentiment, and as such form part of that great political body called the Filipino people. Our religious beliefs do not in any way alter our aspiration to become an independent people. Providence has given us our country to love, serve, and die for.

* * * * * * *

"Therefore we petition the President and Congress of the United States and the American people to give us our liberty by granting the independence of our country without further delay."

Since Congressman BACON agrees with the conviction expressed by former Governor General Leonard Wood that the Filipinos are "property loving, law-abiding, sympathetic, intelligent, hospitable, and neighborly," it is not understood how he can prophesy for this same "law-abiding" people "sanguinary conflict" and "never-ending rebellion."

THE WORLD WAR, A LESSON TO MEN AND NATIONS

Some would want us to believe that once independent, the Philippines would be a territory "to quarrel over, to covet, and to become the subject of international intrigue." Right at this juncture it is fitting to quote the opinion of the Hon. Manuel L. Quezon, president of the Philippine Senate and one of the Filipinos' foremost living statesmen:

"When people talk about warlike movements against a free Philippines they have in mind just one nation. They do not mean Russia or China or France or England. They mean Japan. Let us, therefore, consider the question of what Japan might be expected to do if the Philippines were liberated and left to their own resources. I will say at once that Japan, in my opinion, would not dream of any hostile act toward us * * *."

"* * * Surveying the whole horizon of possibilities, I can discern no presage of an attempted seizure of this archipelago as a result of an American withdrawal."

Great inventions, recent discoveries, and rapid advance in science have made the world smaller and brought peoples closer together. A grevious wrong committed in one part of the globe can no longer be concealed; the news of its perpetration spreads with lightning-like rapidity to all corners of the world. World opinion is growing broader and stronger every day. No nation would dare grab another with impunity; no people, no matter how powerful they may be, could take advantage of the weak in a wanton manner without incurring the enmity and wrath of mankind.

The World War has taught a lesson to men and nations. Countless men, women, and children were butchered; property precious and sacred was destroyed; civilization received a crushing blow, the effects of which we are now suffering and will suffer in years to come. It was fought for what? For a set of principles—right, justice, square dealing, and self-determination. Since then empires have fallen, kingdoms have been overthrown, and democracy has gained ground.

ADVANTAGES OF PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

In the light of these facts we are firmly convinced that:

1. Philippine separation would have no disastrous effect upon American cotton mills, cigarette factories, steel mills, and other industries. Instead, it would aid America's unemployment situation by restricting—if she sees fit to do this—Filipino immigration.

2. Freedom for the Philippines would increase the Oriental people's faith in America, for then they will believe that she came to the islands "not to exploit but to develop, to civilize, to educate, to train in the science of self-government." It would promote better fellowship between the Chinese, Japanese, Filipinos, and other neighbors.

3. Redemption of America's pledge would solidify the Filipinos as a people; they will realize that sanguinary conflict would bring them no benefits and that in mutual cooperation they could perform the noble task of nation building; a sovereign Philippines would bring about a renaissance in Philippine life in educational, political, social and economic fields. The people will mix the bitter with the sweet and share in the common feeling that at last they have one country to love, independent and free, in which to live and for which to die.

4. America will be better loved and admired by peoples the world over when she grants freedom to the Filipinos. Nations who fear that the United States has imperialistic designs in the Far East would then be convinced that America does not only preach what she practices but practices what she preaches.

5. The establishment of the first Christian Republic in the Far East would be America's outstanding contribution to the peace of the world. It will be the first time in history that the people of one race obtain their freedom from those of another, not through war and bloodshed but through constitutional means and peace.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in accordance with the instructions of the Senate last evening, the Finance Committee met and have agreed upon all the items referred to. I now ask unanimous consent to present the amendments agreed upon, and will state exactly the revenue to be obtained from each item covered in the request made last evening.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator does not require unanimous consent; he has the right to offer the amendments.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in the section covering toilet preparations, on page 245, lines 17 and 18, I move to strike out "tooth and mouth washes, dentifrices, tooth pastes," and in line 18 to strike out the words "toilet soaps." With those items stricken out the revenue under that paragraph will be $12,000,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I will send the amendment to the desk.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Why not have a vote on it?

Mr. SMOOT. I want to have a vote on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I inquire if that is not an amendment to the House text?

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment is presented in accordance with the instructions given the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that; but the parliamentary situation is that there is pending before the Senate an amendment to strike out the House text.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I suggest that the Senator from Utah ask leave to withdraw the committee amendment and offer the amendment he has suggested.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, as to all items as to which the committee was instructed to act, that the votes whereby the paragraphs were stricken out may be reconsidered.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. They have been reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. They have all been reconsidered.

Mr. NORRIS. The votes were reconsidered and the amendments are now before the Senate. I ask the Chair if I am not right about it? There is pending the committee amendment which strikes out the House text. We ought to vote on the committee amendment and defeat it unless it is withdrawn.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. REED. The pending amendment being the committee amendment to strike out the entire section, is not, then, an amendment such as that offered by the Senator from Utah an amendment to perfect the text proposed to be stricken out? Is not that in order, and should it not be voted on before the committee amendment to strike out the whole paragraph?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the proper procedure. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to perfect the House text.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, Mr. President, I move to perfect the text as suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania on page 245, lines 17 and 18, by striking out "tooth and mouth washes, dentrifices, tooth pastes," and in line 18 to strike out "toilet soaps."

I want to say to the Senate the effect of that will be to raise $12,000,000 of revenue.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah to perfect the text.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. President, let us vote on the committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the committee amendment striking out the section as amended.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. The next item is jewelry. On page 246, line 12, after the word "instruments," I move to insert the words "or sterling silver or silver-plated ware or spectacles or eyeglasses"; on page 246, line 13, after the word "clocks," to insert a semicolon and the words "parts of watches or clocks sold for more than 9 cents each"; and on page 246, line 14, after the period to insert "No tax shall be imposed under this section on any articles used for religious purposes or any article sold for less than $3."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. How much revenue will that yield?

Mr. SMOOT. It will yield $5,000,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah to perfect the House text.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, do I understand that eyeglasses and spectacles are to be exempt?

Mr. SMOOT. They are.

Mr. COPELAND. And that all articles sold for a price under $3 are to be exempt?

Mr. SMOOT. The exemption applies to all articles sold for less than $3.

Mr. COPELAND. I think that improves the bill very much; but I am frank to say that we will not get any revenue from the tax on jewelry, for the jewelry concerns of this country are not selling any jewelry.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the amendment is divisible, is it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is divisible.

Mr. CONNALLY. I ask for a separate vote on the amendment exempting sterling silver.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas asks for a separate vote. Will the Senator again state the portion of the amendment on which he desires a separate vote taken?

Mr. CONNALLY. The first portion of the amendment contains the words "or sterling silver," which operates to exempt sterling silver.

Mr. President, I see no reason why sterling silver should be exempted from the tax when other articles of jewelry are to be taxed. Everyone knows that sterling silverware is more or less a luxury. Silver is now cheaper than it has been for many years and it can bear the tax more easily now than it has ever been able within the memory of most of us to bear the tax. So I am opposed to the insertion of the words "or sterling silver," and hope the Senate will vote that portion of the amendment down.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, the silver production of the United States declined from 50,700,000 ounces in 1930 to 31,000,000 ounces in 1931, and in value from $19,500,000 in 1930 to $9,000,000 in 1931.

Over 80 per cent of the silver produced in the United States is derived from copper, lead, and zinc ores, and with the lowest prices of silver, copper, lead, and zinc in history now prevailing, the production of silver is due further to decline in 1932.

In a campaign carried on jointly by the American Silver Producers Association and the Sterling Silversmiths Guild to popularize sterling silverware sales increased in 1931, and over 15,000,000 ounces of silver was consumed in the manufacture of sterling ware, notwithstanding that dollar sales and profits were unfavorable. This favorable result was accomplished largely by greatly reducing sterling silver prices.

In its present position the principal factor in the silver market is the industrial demand. Since the total silver produced in the United States in 1931 was 31,000,000 ounces and the amount consumed in the manufacture of sterling ware was 15,000,000 ounces, it is evident how important a factor the manufacturing of sterling silverware is in determining the price of silver.

The tax bill as passed by the House, in section 604, provided for a tax of 10 per cent on the sale price of sterling silverware. That is the item now under discussion. The Senate Committee on Finance wisely eliminated section 604 from the bill, as the imposition of this tax would result in substantially reducing the sale of silverware and in correspondingly lessening the amount of silver consumed in its manufacture. Such a decrease in the industrial demand would have a marked influence, reducing the price of silver. Mines in the United States producing silver would be forced still further to curtail operations or to shut down, contributing to the present unemployment.

As serious as the effect of this tax on the metal-mining industry of the country would be, it will be still more damaging to the foreign trade of the United States with China and India. The people of China and India are now compelled to exchange a little over 3 ounces of silver for a dollar's worth of goods in the United States. If the price of silver, by virtue of imposing this tax, declined to 25 cents per ounce, the people in the Orient, comprising over half of the world's population, would be compelled to exchange 4 ounces of silver for every dollar's worth of goods. While the foreign trade of the United States and the Orient has been and is now subnormal because of the low exchange value of silver, the imposition of this tax would further accentuate the situation, resulting in the further reduction of this trade.

Therefore, in the interest of the American silver producers and manufacturers and in behalf of the foreign trade of the United States with the Orient, I urge upon the Senate the importance of relieving sterling silverware from the imposition of this tax.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the first branch of the amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 246, line 12, after the word "instruments," it is proposed to insert "or sterling silver."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert "or silver plate ware or spectacles or eyeglasses."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask the Senator if he will not accept an amendment to that so that it will read "or frames or mountings for spectacles or eyeglasses"?

Mr. SMOOT. I think that is proper. In writing up the amendments this morning we were very much hurried, as the Senator knows, and I am perfectly willing to accept that suggestion. That was really the intention of the committee from the beginning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be reported for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. As proposed to be modified, the amendment will read:

Or silver plate ware or frames or mountings for spectacles or eyeglasses.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 246, line 11, after the word "clocks," it is proposed to insert a semicolon and the following:

Parts for watches or clocks sold for more than 9 cents each.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment proposed by Mr. SMOOT was, on page 246, line 14, after the period, to insert "No tax shall be imposed under this section on any article used for religious purposes or any article sold for less than $3."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendment striking out the section as amended should be disagreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment proposing to strike out the section.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the next amendment is on page 252, line 5, after the word "rackets," to insert a comma and the words "tennis-racket frames and strings."

That is one amendment, and then there are two others.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. The next amendment is, on page 252, line 6, to strike out the words "and cushions."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. The next amendment is, on page 252, line 8, to strike out "goals" and insert in lieu thereof "uniforms."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may I ask what action was taken on the sterling-silver item? Was that amendment disagreed to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I mean the amendment to strike out the exemption of sterling silver. That was not agreed to, was it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to strike out those words was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood that that amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. REED and Mr. WATSON addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Has the Senator any more amendments to this section?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, there is a good deal of confusion here about what happened on the item about which the Senator just inquired.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not agree, as the Senator knows, with his contention that solid-silver jewelry should be exempted from tax; but I do not want the Senator to be under any misapprehension as to what the Senate has done.

Mr. WATSON. No.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senate took a separate vote on that, and my understanding is that the vote to exempt solid silver was defeated; so that the way the amendment now stands, solid-silver jewelry and ware will be taxed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have just made inquiry at the desk, and I find that the understanding of the clerk is the same as that stated by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I ask unanimous consent that the vote which was taken on the amendment of the Senator from Texas be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not think that ought to be done without the Senator from Texas being present.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I think it ought to be reconsidered, because Senators did not understand how they were voting. We are so mixed up on these "ayes" and "noes" this morning that none of us know how we are voting.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not possible that the Senate is going to tax an industry that is absolutely destroyed.

Mr. DILL. At least not unanimously.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first request would be to reconsider the vote whereby the whole section was stricken out. The second would be to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I ask.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, Mr. President, I ask that the vote on sterling silver be reconsidered, since it was cast under a misapprehension.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator want to put that request while the Senator from Texas, who made the motion, is out of the Chamber?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. FESS. We have been confused here as to whether the amendment is an exemption or is an insertion.

Mr. SMOOT. We inserted here "or sterling silver, or silver-plated ware." The Senator from Texas moved to strike out "sterling silver."

Mr. FESS. Where is "sterling silver"?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator asked for a separate vote upon that question. The separate vote was had, and the noes carried.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from Ohio that while the motion is to strike out, sterling silver was excepted from the jewelry section; and the motion to strike out would bring it back and make it taxable.

Mr. FESS. There is the confusion. I did not know whether it was to insert it or to except it.

Mr. GEORGE. The insertion was by way of an exception from the operation of the statute.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I say a word in explanation?

Under the House bill silver-plated ware and solid silverware would be taxable. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah would introduce an exception in that section, which would have the result of excluding plated silverware and solid silverware from the tax imposed by the section. The Senator from Texas asked for a separate vote on that proposal, which was coupled by the Senator from Utah with two or three other amendments at other places in the same section. On that separate vote, apparently, those Senators who wanted to except silverware all voted "no"; and so the proposal of the Senator from Utah was defeated, and the exception was not introduced into the section. That is what we are trying to reconstruct now.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, does not the confusion arise from the fact that most Members thought they were voting on an amendment to the House text instead of an amendment to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMOOT. I certainly desire that the intention of the Senate be carried out.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Utah that I shall have no objection to unanimous consent to reconsider the vote whereby the committee amendment was agreed to as amended, if it is understood that final action shall not be taken upon it until the Senator from Texas, who is temporarily absent from the Chamber, can be present.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing that that shall be done.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, why does not the Senator pass over this matter for the present, and go ahead with his other propositions?

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I am going to do. I am perfectly willing, with that understanding, to go on with other matters until the Senator from Texas arrives.

On page 246, line 13, after the word "clocks," I move to insert a semicolon and the words "parts for watches or clocks sold for more than 9 cents each."

Mr. REED. That was agreed to some time ago, was it not?

Mr. SMOOT. No; that is the next amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was agreed to, and the one on line 14 was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I should like to suggest that in his progress he has passed over inadvertently section 608, the tax on mechanical refrigerators. I understand that it is the Senator's intention to ask that that committee amendment be rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. On page 250, beginning on line 20, down to and including line 3, on page 251, there is $6,000,000 involved; and I ask that the Senate committee amendment be rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. On page 252——

Mr. REED. Let us finish the rest of the refrigerators' paragraph, beginning on line 4.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not that down here. The balance of it is on page 251, line 4, down to and including line 23.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What is the motion?

Mr. SMOOT. To reject the committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I understand that there is some inquiry about a matter in which I was interested.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; there was a misunderstanding as to the action of the Senate in relation to it.

Mr. CONNALLY. There should not be any misunderstanding as to the action of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. I have asked unanimous consent for a reconsideration.

Mr. CONNALLY. I will yield to the unanimous consent on account of the Senator from Utah; but there ought not to be any doubt as to what the Senate did. The Senate committee amendment had the effect of exempting from the tax sterling silver. That was voted down, which makes sterling silver subject to the tax.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct, and that is the action which was taken; but there was a misunderstanding as to the way the question arose.

Mr. CONNALLY. The only misunderstanding was on the part of Senators who did not watch what was going on.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but is the Senator objecting to a reconsideration?

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, no; I accede to unanimous consent on the request of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I ask that the vote on the amendment offered by the Senator be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The reconsideration would have to be of the whole provision, as suggested before by the Chair—the motion to strike out and also the amendment of the Senator from Texas. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. Now the question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas to reject the committee amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. I asked that the question be divided.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the first amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 246, line 12, after "instruments," it is proposed to insert "or sterling silver."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the effect of this amendment offered by the committee will be to exempt sterling silver from the tax. If Senators want to tax sterling silver, they should vote "no." If they want to exempt it, they should vote "aye."

I have no vendetta against silver, Mr. President; but this bill taxes thousands of articles. If a boy buys a $4 watch, this bill is going to hit him right in the eye; but if his father buys a set of sterling silver costing hundreds of dollars, it does not pay a cent. As one Senator says, if the boy's father buys a very fine and expensive cocktail shaker made of sterling silver, he pays nothing; but if the boy buys some article of utility and necessity, like a baseball bat, the boy has to pay a tax on his baseball bat, while the old man is in the back room shaking a cocktail. [Laughter.]

It does not seem to me that it is fair or just to exempt all sorts of sterling silverware, which is a luxury. I should like to have more sterling silverware than I have. I have very little. Some Senator says he does not want any more than he has. I assume from that that he is already so well-to-do and so well provided with sterling silverware that he does not care to acquire any more; but we are out hunting for taxes. We have gone around here with a regular fine-tooth comb after the chewing-gum people, the boys and girls who chew chewing gum, and after the movie folks, and after the sporting goods, the baseball bats and the tennis rackets, and the cosmetics, and every other form of taxation which the ingenuity of the Treasury or the sleepless and untiring labor of the Finance Committee can ascertain. Yet when it comes to sterling silverware—an absolute luxury—at a time when it can be bought more cheaply than in 50 years, perhaps, at a time when it can bear the tax with the least burden, gentlemen come up and urge that we tax all these other necessities, but that this luxury shall be exempted from tax.

I ask the Senate to vote "no" on this amendment, and thereby keep sterling silverware within the tax.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair suggests that the better plan would be to move to strike out the words "or sterling silver."

Mr. CONNALLY. That is just reversing it. I accede to the request of the Chair; but I think that is unfair, because it puts on us the burden of a majority vote, whereas with a negative vote we do not require a majority.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield; but may I make a parliamentary inquiry?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Texas was correct in that statement, was he not—that if he makes a motion to strike out, it requires a majority?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct.

Mr. CONNALLY. And if the question arises negatively, it requires only a tie. So I think I will resist the tempting suggestion of the Chair.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. The Senator from Texas strikes the nail on the head when he says that silver never was cheaper in the history of the world. The facts of the case are that the tax on silver articles now simply means driving the nail in the coffin of silver, which was already ready for the undertaker.

Mr. CONNALLY. I do not agree with that. Let me say to the Senator from Idaho that I have no feud against silver, but we are going to tax silver jewelry of other kinds.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. It surely will depreciate the price of silver to do it.

Mr. CONNALLY. The effect of this tax on the price of silver would not amount to anything of consequence whatever; but if silver is so cheap, and people want to buy sterling silver for their household use, and it is a luxury, why can they not bear the tax now more easily than they formerly could?

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. The effect on the price of silver is a thing of concern to me.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is hardly a silver-producing mine now left in the United States. Practically all of them are closed down. One or two are operating now, at a loss, in order to give the employees something to do. Never in the history of the world has the price of silver been what it is to-day. Silver can not be produced while it is bringing the present price, and all we are asking is that it shall not be taxed, under the conditions existing to-day. There is no industry, from one end of this country to the other, that suffers as does the silver industry; not one.

It is for these reasons, Mr. President, that I have suggested that sterling silverware be made exempt from taxation. I do not think there is a Senator in this body who does not know of the situation in the United States regarding silver production. There are just a few loyal citizens, who are losing tens of thousands of dollars every month to give employment to the people in the mines, who are still running their mines, and they can not go on much farther, at least, if a further burden is put upon the industry.

I sincerely hope that the suggestion of the Senator from Texas will not be agreed to.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. DILL. Is it not a fact that every time we depress the price of silver, we depress the price of the other products of the world, whether they come from the forest, the mine, the farm, or the factory?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question about it.

Mr. DILL. That has been true through all the history of the centuries.

Mr. CONNALLY, Mr. HOWELL, and Mr. BARKLEY addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. I want the floor in my own right.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, this proposal is not to levy a tax upon bullion silver. The proposal is to levy a tax upon articles made from silver. The fact ought to be kept clearly in mind that when we go into a retail shop to buy sterling silver we pay a hundred per cent to the retailer. There is no article one buys to-day on which he pays such a large overhead. The overhead varies generally from 40 to 60 per cent; that is, what is sold for a dollar cost the retailer from 40 to 60 cents. In this case what sold for a dollar cost 50 cents.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. We all are familiar with the low price of raw silver. I should like to inquire whether that low price has been reflected proportionately in the price of the finished product, either of the sterling or plated silverware?

Mr. HOWELL. It has not, and anyone can easily satisfy himself as to that by inquiry.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will this tax on sterling silver, if it is adopted, have any effect on the price of raw silver?

Mr. SMOOT. It certainly will.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I have personally seen sterling silverware in the last few months sold for far less than it ever has been sold for before in the retail stores.

Mr. SMOOT. Less than half.

Mr. ODDIE. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I have not had an answer to the question I propounded a moment ago. I have had occasion recently, not for myself but for some one else, to inquire at a local shop in Washington with reference to the price of sterling silver, and I found no reduction in the price anywhere proportionately near the reduction in the price of the raw material, and I was wondering whether, if we levy a small percentage of tax upon this high quality of finished silver products we will really affect the price of the raw material in any respect.

Mr. SMOOT. No doubt it will.

Mr. BARKLEY. How?

Mr. SMOOT. Because if the manufacturer makes the price—and that the Senator seems to think he is doing now—he is not going to change it.

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not know who makes the price, but I know there has been no appreciable reduction in the price of sterling silver.

Mr. SMOOT. You can go into a shop and buy it for half what you paid three or four years ago.

Mr. BARKLEY. You can see those reductions advertised in the newspapers, but if you go in, you will find that there is no such reduction.

Mr. SMOOT. I see them announced in the windows of every shop that sells silverware.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I am going to yield to the blandishments of the Chair, in order to simplify this matter, and make a motion to strike out the words "or sterling silver." Some Senators seem to be confused about it.

I did not know that the whole silver problem was involved in this one simple little item. One might judge, from what we hear Senators on the other side contend, that if we refrain from putting this tax on silver, the monetary problem of the world will be solved.

Mr. President, that is ridiculous. I do not suppose the amount of bullion silver that will go into sterling silverware in the next two years, during the pendency of these excise taxes, will amount to a fraction of 1 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the only use made of silver to-day.

Mr. CONNALLY. Has the Senator any statistics to show what percentage of silver is used in sterling silverware?

Mr. SMOOT. I can not state the percentage, but the great bulk of it is used in that direction. None is coined into money now. I should think over 95 per cent of it is used in the manufacture of sterling silverware.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, Mr. President!

Mr. SMOOT. Well, where is the silver of the world being used?

Mr. CONNALLY. A great deal of it is used in the manufacture of plated ware, cheap ware, of course. But I do not care to consume more of the time of the Senate. I am not urging this as a tax in normal times. Look at the rigorous taxes this bill would impose. Gentlemen, speak of silver. Are we not taxing every other business in this country? Of course these taxes are distasteful. Of course they are going to be onerous. But we have to get the money somewhere. Sterling silverware is a luxury. It is proposed that we impose a tax on cheap jewelry, priced above $3. We will tax sporting goods and we will tax a myriad of other things in this country. Yet when it comes to sterling silverware, which only the prosperous and the well-to-do can afford, the Senator from Utah, because he is afraid it will hurt some silver mine somewhere, objects.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not the silver mine; it is the men who work in the silver mine.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, of course; I know the mine is not animate, it does not vote or express itself; but we will get some taxes on this; and whenever we offer to take out a tax the chairman of the committee throws up his hands and says, "We shall lose so many millions of dollars." We shall lose some more millions of dollars if this is not retained.

Mr. SMOOT. No; we would not lose millions of dollars.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator says 95 per cent of the raw silver is used in the manufacture of sterling silverware.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. If that is true, and we get 10 per cent of it, we ought to get a lot of money. Either the Senator is incorrect now or he was incorrect a moment ago.

I move to strike out the words "or sterling silver." Let us put a small, insignificent, easily borne, hidden tax on this product. The man who buys sterling silver will never know it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask the Senate not to do it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Texas to strike out the words "or sterling silver."

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, there is no question but that the silver-mining industry is frightfully depressed; but so is the general jewelry business frightfully depressed. The senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] will bear me out when I state that of all the communications which have come to him, there was no story of depression and unemployment more pronounced than in the case of the jewelry manufacturers.

Mr. METCALF rose.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield to the Senator for a reply.

Mr. METCALF. The Senator is quite right. The information that has come to me is that the men employed in that industry are loafing on the streets, that there is nothing for them to do.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. The committee took that into consideration.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I appreciate that.

Mr. SMOOT. And we put in the amendment relating to articles sold for less than $3.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Which includes sterling silver articles selling for less than $3.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but there is hardly any of it sold at less than $3.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I do not want to say anything at length about this, but if we are going to eliminate sales taxes on depressed industries, we should include them all. It is only a matter of fraction of degrees which industry is the most depressed.

I wonder if we realize the extent of the depression in this country. Let me quote from some letters received from the representatives of this industry:

It happens that we have been the most successful jewelers in Fall River and have sold over $100,000 per year during each of several years. Last year our sales had shrunk under the $50,000 mark, and we had to take an inventory loss of over $5,000 because of lower prices and reduced sales, etc. We cut our salaries 60 per cent and then earned about 2 per cent on our investment.

For the first three months of this year we sold $4,730.52, or at an annual sales rate of less than $20,000, and I do not expect to make even 40 per cent of my former salary, and it is quite probable that I shall not earn even a dollar a week. A small manufacturer told me recently (Charles Church, of Church & Co., Newark, N. J.) that his losses for bad debts last year were greater than the combined total for all of his other 8 or 10 years in business. This shows the prevailing conditions in the jewelry business now. Because of this, I earnestly request that you see that you do all you can to prevent a special tax on jewelry.

We feel that the tax of 10 per cent is very unjust, and we jewelers who have actually lost money on our business in the last two years will be forced to close our doors.

April 11, 1930, my retail sales were $86.30.

April 11, 1931, my retail sales were $46.95.

April 11, 1932, my retail sales were $6.10.

So you see how our business is going, and we are not any worse off than the other jewelers.

* * * * * * *

The Kansas Retail Jewelers' Association protests against the Senate Finance Committee reporting favorably on the 10 per cent jewelry tax.

My own jewelry business, which I think is similar to most jewelers, has not even paid operating expenses during the first four months of this year. This does not include any salary for myself, and I am working every day.

My sales for the first four months of 1932 were 20 per cent less than for 1931. My 1931 sales were 27.6 per cent below the 1928 figure.

You can see from the above figures that a 10 per cent tax on jewelry will mean bankruptcy for a great many jewelers.

The jewelry industry is willing to pay any tax that is equally imposed on every other industry, but feels that the bill in its present form is highly discriminatory on an industry which is passing through the worst crisis of its history.

* * * * * * *

The proposed tax on jewelry of 10 per cent seems to us to discriminate against the jewelry business most unfairly.

During the war the jewelers gladly paid a 5 per cent luxury tax, when times were good and money plenty. No jeweler in the country is paying his expenses at present, and has been running behind for the past two years, according to reports at national headquarters.

We believe it unjust to tax any one industry in this manner and feel that the one tax which is absolutely just to all is a very slight tax on every sale, on all merchandise.

May we not hope that you will work against this unjust tax on jewelry and for a tax which will be fair to all industries?

Mr. President, I rose for the purpose of emphasizing the fact that we are dealing with depression everywhere, in every avenue of life, in every industry, and that these taxes are burdensome and frightful on every industry.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the Senator expect that the retail stores would sell more goods after the imposition of a consumption or sales tax?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Of course not.

Mr. BLAINE. Does the Senator expect that?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Of course they would not sell more. The Senator is absolutely correct.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I have here a package of letters 4 inches thick, from manufacturing jewelers in my State, who say that they are doing no business. I said before the Senator rose that if it is expected that this jewelry item will bring revenue, the committee will be very greatly disappointed.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think it is only fair to say for the committee, however, that they did appreciate to an extent that the cheapest jewelry, the 10 to 25 cent jewelry, which is worn by children and sold in the popular-priced stores, should be exempt, and I think they made a reasonable concession.

I take the position that if any of these taxes are imposed, this is as reasonable as any of them, but it seems to me we should not make any exception.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I am glad to see so many people interested in silver. I am particularly glad to see the chairman of the Finance Committee stand here on the floor and defend silver in this particular instance, although I agree to a large extent with what the Senator from Texas has said, that the mere placing of a tax upon silver is not going to have very much effect upon the world price of silver.

Let me call attention to some facts which appear from a communication I have in my hand, which has just been prepared by the Department of Commerce. We are all talking about prices being depressed in this country, and the table I have in my hand shows why they are depressed in the United States.

Here is a list of countries officially off the gold or gold-exchange standard:

Denmark, Finland, Greece, Norway, Portugal, Sweden, United Kingdom, Japan, British India, Straits Settlements, Siam, Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Ecuador, Paraguay, Uruguay, Peru, Mexico, and El Salvador.

Here is also a list of countries not officially but practically off the gold or gold-exchange standard:

Austria, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, Germany, Hungary, Yugoslavia, and Canada.

Here is a list of countries where gold exports were officially prohibited from October 19, 1931, to March 1, 1932, unofficially restricted since that date:

Venezuela, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, Colombia, and Bolivia.

All these countries are off the gold standard, and, as the result of the fact, the figures are set forth as to how much their money has been cheapened by reason of the fact that they have gone off the gold standard.

I ask to have this table printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, in the face of the fact that all of the countries of the world, practically, have gone off the gold standard, we are still trying to stay on the gold standard, and for that reason our trade has been practically stopped with all of these countries.

How is it possible for a country which is off the gold standard to continue to trade with a country that is on the gold standard? Yet when something of this kind comes up we see many Senators rise in their places in the Senate and defend silver.

I have introduced a bill for the remonetization of silver, which is before the Committee on Finance of the Senate, of which the Senator from Utah is the chairman. I have not been able thus far to get the bill reported out of the committee. I want to say, however, to the Senate that before we close the present session of the Congress I insist and am going to insist that we shall have a vote upon my bill for the remonetization of silver. If we can not get it reported out of the committee, then I am going to offer it as an amendment to some one of the bills which will come before the Senate. I want to see how many friends of silver, among all those who have advocated and said they are in favor of the remonetization of silver, will vote for the bill when the time comes. I want to find out how many Democrats there are on this side of the Chamber who have advocated the remonetization of silver who will actually vote for it when the time comes.

I am convinced after careful consideration of the subject that something has got to be done to bring the commodity price level back to where it was in 1926. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] the other day spoke of the cheap dollar and the honest dollar. He intimated that if we brought commodity prices back to where they were in 1926 by cheapening the dollar we would have a dishonest dollar. The trouble in the country at the present time, if we follow his formula, is that we have a dishonest dollar, because the dollar to-day is not the same as it was in 1926. What I am seeking to do is to try to make the dollar purchase to-day what it purchased in 1926, 1927, and 1928.

I submit that notwithstanding the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill, notwithstanding the Glass-Steagall bill, and notwithstanding the other nostrums which have been advocated and approved by the Congress, we are not going to get the commodity price level of products up in this country unless we do one of two things—either adopt bimetallism or go off the gold standard and resort to paper. As between those two plans I say it is much safer for this country and for the countries of the world to adopt bimetallism than to resort to the printing press.

I know there are many people who think we ought to resort to the printing presses, but I am not one who want to go that far. If we resort to bimetallism and adopt it as an independent proposition in this country, then because of the fact that we would take the trade England now enjoys with China, Japan, and India she would be immediately forced to adopt bimetallism. If Great Britain and the United States adopt it, is there anyone in this body who for a moment would challenge the statement that those two great countries could maintain the ratio between silver and gold at 16 to 1 or 15 to 1 or 14 to 1, or at any other ratio desired? On top of that, Germany and all the countries that are off the gold standard would go to bimetallism.

The chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, as I am informed, has stated in the public press that he is in favor of bimetallism, as has the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the Senate also stated. Why is it that these gentlemen, who realize the situation, have not uttered one word upon the floor of the Senate in favor of my bill to restore bimetallism in this country and have not worked as diligently in this matter as they have on numerous measures which have been pending before the Congress? I am sure, if the Senator from Utah, chairman of the important Committee on Finance, would take a stand for remonetization of silver and work as diligently for it as he has for the other measures which have been before his committee, there would not be any question but that we could adopt it at this session of Congress.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, all the other bills on the subject, with the exception of the bill of the Senator from Montana, were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] introduced a bill, which was referred to that committee. I introduced a bill, which was referred to that committee. The committee on Banking and Currency have held hearings upon all the bills. I understand that that committee will very shortly make a report. There is no need for two committees to hold hearings upon the same subject. If all the bills had been referred to the Finance Committee I would gladly have taken them up. But it seems to me as long as the Committee on Banking and Currency have the subject matter under considerations and hearings have been held upon the bill of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], it is not only unnecessary but unwise for the Finance Committee to hold hearings at the same time. I understand the Banking and Currency Committee will soon report out the bill of the Senator from Nevada. I do not know how soon, but I am quite sure it will not be very long if I may judge from what was stated by the chairman of the subcommittee having it in charge.

The Senator from Montana does not think two committees ought to conflict in this matter, does he?

Mr. WHEELER. What I think about it is this. The Senator knows something about bimetallism. I know personally that he has made a study of it and is familiar with the subject. The subject was before his committee a long time before the Senator from Nevada introduced his bill. It has been lying dormant in his committee. I am sure if the Senator would use his ordinary diligence and zeal that he has used in other matters, he would have reported the bill out. Let me call attention to the fact also that hearings were had before the Finance Committee with reference to the remonetization of silver.

I know that the mining interests of the country are interested in increasing the price of silver to themselves. I am not interested in the silver question for the sole sake of helping the mining companies of the country. I am interested in making silver do the work it ought to do as a part of the financial system of the United States and of the world, because if we are going to restore trade and industry in this country and throughout the world, if we are going to recapture the trade of the Orient and South America and Latin America, then the best way and the only way to do it is by the remonetization of silver rather than resorting to a lot of nostrums that are being introduced and being projected by the mining companies themselves, for the sole benefit of their own selfish interests. I am not interested in it from that standpoint.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY].

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I want to say a word in support of the amendment of the Senator from Texas. The committee this morning, after weeks ago having stricken out the tax on candy, put it back again. Now we are going to tax at the rate of 2 per cent the little lollipops and all the other candy that goes into the mouths of the children. Unless we support the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas we are going to let all the solid silverware and plated ware and jewelry be sold without a tax. Walk up and down Fifth Avenue and look at the jewelry stores with their displays of silverware, and understand that that is all going to be purchased by the very wealthy, and it is to be exempt from tax, while we place a 2 per cent tax upon candy for the children. If there is any justification in that, I do not understand it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HASTINGS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Colorado and vote "nay."

Mr. SHEPPARD (when Mr. LONG's name was called). I am authorized to state that the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] is absent on legislative business. He is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN].

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], who is unavoidably detained from the Senate by illness. In his absence I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PATTERSON. I announce my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] and withhold my vote.

Mr. JONES. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I have been unable to obtain a transfer, and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MCNARY. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is necessarily absent on account of official business.

Mr. SCHALL. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. I do not know how he would vote on this question if present, and therefore withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. BYRNES. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. Not being advised as to how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If free to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I inquire if my colleague [Mr. WAGNER] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The junior Senator from New York has not voted.

Mr. COPELAND. If my colleague were present and permitted to vote, he would vote "nay."

Mr. WATSON (after having voted in the negative). I discover that my general pair, the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], is out of the Chamber. I transfer my pair with him to the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and permit my vote to stand.

Mr. DICKINSON. I wish to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] has a general pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY].

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] are necessarily absent on official business.

I desire further to announce that the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] and the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] are necessarily out of the city.

Mr. PATTERSON (after having voted in the affirmative). As my pair, the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], has not voted, I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 42, nays 30, as follows:

So Mr. CONNALLY'S amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment striking out the paragraph.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, am I correct in understanding that the amendment proposing to strike out the jewelry paragraph has been rejected?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That amendment has been rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. On page 252, line 5, in the sporting goods items, after the word "rackets," I move to insert a comma and the words "tennis-racket frames and strings."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. On page 253, line 2——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will advise the Senator that there is pending another amendment to the preceding section. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 252, line 6, it is proposed to strike out the words "and cushions," and on line 8 to strike out "goals" and insert in lieu thereof "uniforms."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the question now recurs on agreeing to the committee amendment striking out the paragraph.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is correct. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment proposing to strike out the paragraph.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on page 253——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will excuse me, the next amendment, I understand, is on page 252, line 16.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That went over by consent yesterday.

Mr. SMOOT. We want to disagree to that amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. We want to disagree to the committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 252, line 16, it is proposed to strike out, after line 15, down to the end of line 24, being section 610, tax on firearms, shells, and cartridges.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to strike out.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, how does that leave section 610?

Mr. SMOOT. It leaves it as the House passed it.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, was final action taken on the mechanical-refrigerator item?

Mr. REED. That item has been reinstated.

Mr. COPELAND. I am sorry that it has.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on page 253, line 2, after the word "cameras," I move to insert the words "except aerial cameras."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to striking out that section has not been reconsidered. The question is on reconsidering the vote by which the amendment was agreed to. Without objection, the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to is reconsidered. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment striking out the paragraph.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. On page 253, section 612, the tax on matches——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The vote whereby that paragraph was stricken out has not been reconsidered. The Senator from Wisconsin entered a motion to reconsider that vote.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I make the motion that the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to may be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to that section. On page 253, line 8, I move to strike out "4" and insert "2."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. In line 9, I move to strike out "matches" and insert "except that in the case of all paper matches in books the tax shall be one-half of 1 cent per 1,000 matches."

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, why does the Senator make a distinction between wooden matches and paper matches?

Mr. SMOOT. The little paper matches in books are used largely for advertising purposes, while wooden matches are not used in that way. So in the case of paper matches the committee thought the tax should be one-half of 1 cent per thousand.

Mr. COPELAND. And what is the rate on wooden matches?

Mr. SMOOT. Two cents a thousand.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator is it proposed to exempt paper matches? I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. No. The tax now proposed is one-half of 1 cent per thousand on paper matches.

Mr. BULKLEY. And is it proposed to make the rate on wooden matches 1 cent?

Mr. SMOOT. No; 2 cents.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah. By the sound the ayes seem to have it.

Mr. HALE. I ask for a division.

On a division the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on agreeing to the amendment to strike out.

The motion was rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on page 253, section 613, the tax on candy, I ask the Senate to disagree to the Senate amendment, and I desire to offer an amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin entered a motion to reconsider the vote whereby that amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I now make the motion that the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to may be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the committee have agreed to make the rate on candy 2 per cent instead of 5 per cent, and I offer that amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I can hardly understand why the committee has placed any tax on candy. Is it not going to give any consideration to the children of America?

Mr. SMOOT. The reason is that we can obtain $5,000,000 revenue from the tax. The proposal now is made in conformity with the action taken in the bill regarding the tax on chewing gum.

Mr. COPELAND. That is, there is to be a tax of 2 cents on chewing gum and 2 cents on candy?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but we have reduced the rate provided by the House from 5 per cent to 2 per cent, and under the rate proposed there will be raised $5,000,000 revenue.

Mr. COPELAND. How much does the Senator expect will be realized from this tax?

Mr. SMOOT. As I have stated, it is expected that $5,000,000 will be raised.

Mr. COPELAND. That is not so much as the Senator expects will be raised from the tax on wort?

Mr. SMOOT. Not nearly so much.

Mr. COPELAND. I venture to say that the tax on candy will extract far more money from the children of this country than will be derived from a tax on illicit beer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah striking out "5" and inserting "2."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment of the committee to strike out the paragraph.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. Tax on chewing gum, line 17, page 253.

Mr. SMOOT. That was agreed to last night, as I understand.

Mr. BARKLEY. The amendment to the language was agreed to, but the paragraph itself went over.

Mr. HARRISON. That was not agreed to. It went over in the same attitude as the others. An amendment providing for 2 per cent was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what was agreed to.

Mr. REED. There was nothing left to agree to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That was agreed to last night, so the clerk says.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] said he was going to move to strike that out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understood that the Senator withdrew the motion.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from South Carolina, as I understood, was not going to move to strike it out unless some of these other provisions were stricken out. He wanted it put upon the same basis as the other.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator withdrew his motion.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 253, strike out lines 19 to 25, both inclusive, which was passed over—the tax on soft drinks.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on line 25, I move to strike "2" and insert in lieu thereof "1¼."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Utah proposes, on page 253, line 25, to strike out "2" and insert in lieu thereof "1¼."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 253, after line 25, it is proposed to insert a new paragraph, as follows:

Upon unfermented grape juice, in natural or concentrated form (whether or not sugar has been added), containing 35 per cent or less of sugars by weight, a tax of 5 cents per gallon.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 254, line 1, after "juices," insert "except grape juice."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 254, line 13, after "drinks," insert "except grape juice."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 255, line 4, and again in line 14, strike out the numeral "9" and insert in lieu thereof the numeral "6."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the committee amendment to strike out.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. The next amendment is on page 284.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. REED. How far has the Senate proceeded with the consideration of the bill? What is the last amendment acted on?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Pages 262 and 263, last night.

Mr. REED. Then I suggest that the next matter for consideration is the Senate committee amendment on page 264, line 1—a mere administrative amendment.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania what disposition was made of section 611 on page 262.

Mr. SMOOT. That went over at the request of the Senator last evening.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, what has happened to the amendments on pages 258, 259, 260, and 261?

Mr. FESS. They were passed over last night.

Mr. REED. Those are going over pending disposition of the tire items.

Mr. DILL. All right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is advised that the next amendment is the one passed over upon the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE].

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That should really await action by the Senate on the committee's recommendation on the tire tax before it is taken up; so I do not enter the motion to reconsider at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be passed over.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think we had better go back now and take up the tire provision.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, before we take that up I desire to ask the Senator from Utah what was done about the tax on boats, on page 250.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, it is proposed at a later place in the bill to insert an excise tax upon the use of boats according to their length, and that is why it was not taken up in passing here.

Mr. DILL. All right.

Mr. SMOOT. I think we had better take that up at the present time.

On page 286, after line 19, I move to insert a new part, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 286, after line 19, it is proposed to insert:

PART —. TAX ON BOATS

SECTION —. TAX ON USE OF BOATS

(a) On and after July 1, 1932, and on July 1, 1933, and also at the time of the original purchase of a new yacht or other boat by a user, if on any other date than July 1 and before July 1, 1934, there is hereby imposed upon the use of yachts, pleasure boats, power boats, sailing boats, and motor boats with fixed or outboard engines, not used exclusively for trade, fishing, or national defense, a tax at the following rates:

(1) Length over 28 feet and not over 50 feet, $10.
(2) Length over 50 feet and not over 100 feet, $40.
(3) Length over 100 feet and not over 150 feet, $100.
(4) Length over 150 feet and not over 200 feet, $150.
(5) Length over 200 feet, $200.

(b) In the case of any of the foregoing if foreign built and not owned on January 1, 1926, by a citizen of the United States or by a domestic partnership or corporation, the tax under this section shall be twice the amount of the tax provided in subsection (a).

(c) In determining the length of any of the foregoing, the measurement of overall length shall govern.

(d) In the case of a tax imposed at the time of the original purchase of a new yacht or boat on any other date than July 1, the amount to be paid shall be the same number of twelfths of the amount of the tax as the number of calendar months (including the month of sale) remaining prior to the following July 1.

(e) This section shall not apply to any yacht or other boat which is used without profit by any benevolent, charitable, or religious organization, exclusively for furnishing aid, comfort, or relief to seamen.

(f) The taxes imposed by this section shall be collected and paid in such manner as the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, shall by regulation prescribe.

(g) All provisions of law (including penalties) applicable in respect of the taxes imposed by section 702 of the revenue act of 1926 shall, in so far as applicable and not inconsistent with this act, be applicable in respect of the taxes imposed by this section.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I suggest to my colleague that while we are dealing with this we had better label this "Part VI"; and then the present Part VI, tax on cigarette papers, would be Part VII, and the subsequent parts would be renumbered.

Mr. SMOOT. All those will be fixed where there are changes in numbers.

Mr. KING. This would be, then, Part VI.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That will be corrected later on.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, do I understand that this is to be an annual tax upon boats?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; a yearly tax on the use of boats.

Mr. COPELAND. Has the committee given any consideration to putting a yearly tax on washing machines and milking machines and threshing machines?

Mr. SMOOT. Not as yet, Mr. President.

Mr. COPELAND. We may expect that?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator desires it, we can.

Mr. COPELAND. I am prepared for anything, so far as I am concerned.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I send to the desk another amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, before we get to the tax on tires, may we not clean up this matter of the boat tax by reconsidering our action yesterday on page 250, lines 1 to 7? It is intended by the committee, of course, that the tax just adopted, licensing boats, should replace the House provision on page 250. Therefore, I ask unanimous consent that our action on section 606 may be reconsidered; and if that is granted, I move that the Senate committee amendment be agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to reconsideration? The Chair hears none, and the motion to reconsider is agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. How far does the boat amendment that we have just adopted go?

Mr. REED. It only lasts for two years.

Mr. COPELAND. I know; but I mean to say, what length of boat? What is the outside length?

Mr. REED. The highest tax is that a boat over 200 feet in length would pay $200 a year if built in this country. If built abroad since 1926, it would pay $400.

Mr. COPELAND. Does it apply to battleships also?

Mr. REED. No; it applies only to boats used otherwise than for fishing, for trade, or for national defense.

Mr. COPELAND. I am glad there is some limitation to it, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee on page 250, lines 1 to 7.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah offers a further amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 245 it is proposed to strike out lines 5 to 10, both inclusive, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 602. TAX ON TIRES AND INNER TUBES

There is hereby imposed upon the following articles sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer a tax at the following rates:

(1) Tires wholly or in part of rubber, 2¼ cents a pound on total weight (exclusive of metal rims or rim bases), to be determined under regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary.

(2) Inner tubes (for tires) wholly or in part of rubber, 4 cents a pound on total weight, to be determined under regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Utah whether he has any purpose in insisting on making this a different section from the section relating to automobile accessories.

My reason for wanting this item to be inserted in the section on automobile accessories is that there are certain provisions on pages 248 and 249 with respect to abatement and refund of taxes in the event articles on which the tax has been paid are still held by dealers on August 1, 1934.

Mr. SMOOT. As I understand, the tax will be in force about a month longer, and they will get the refund.

Mr. BULKLEY. I thought the question of tires and tubes would be more appropriately considered in connection with section 602, or whatever may be the number as revised of the section relating to automobile accessories.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not see any reason why that should be done.

Mr. BULKLEY. What reason is there, if we should make refunds of taxes on batteries, if they are held by dealers on August 1, 1934, why should we refuse the same consideration as to tires and tubes?

Mr. SMOOT. I am advised that it makes very little difference whether it goes where the Senator desires or not; and if the Senator will offer the amendment, I will have no objection to it.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I would like to have the consideration of the pending amendment deferred; and let us have a vote first on the amendment which was passed over last night, on page 247, line 7, where the committee has proposed an amendment to insert the words "other than tires and inner tubes." In other words, the House included tires and inner tubes as automobile accessories, and the Senate committee proposes to lift tires and tubes out from the word "accessories."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. REED. The effect of striking out the words "other than tires and tubes," on page 247, would be to include tires and tubes among the other accessories, which are taxed at the rate of 2 per cent. Consequently, striking those words out would be equivalent to a reduction to about one-third of the tax on these rubber goods proposed by the committee.

The specific taxes proposed by the committee in the amendment sent to the desk by the Senator from Utah amount, I am told, to around 6 to 8 per cent of the value of the product. Including them as accessories would result in the imposition of a tax of only 2 per cent on their value. Therefore I hope the committee amendment, on line 7, page 247, will be agreed to.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, that is precisely the issue I had intended to raise, and I will take but a few moments of the time of the Senate in discussing it.

As I have said, the House taxed tires and tubes the same as other automobile accessories, at 1 per cent. The Senate last night agreed to an amendment proposed by the committee increasing the tax on accessories to 2 per cent.

Unfortunately, during the consideration of this tax bill by the Finance Committee, somebody suggested to the committee that a very large revenue could be obtained by imposing an import tax on crude rubber, and such a tax was proposed by the committee and estimated to produce some $53,000,000 of revenue. That whole theory, I believe, was fallacious, and I think the committee found out and was satisfied afterwards that there was no possibility of a $53,000,000 revenue, or anything like that, from that item. But because of the committee's natural disappointment in finding that $53,000,000 was not available, and could not be secured, the committee has proposed what I believe to be a very excessive tax on tires and tubes.

I have a great deal of sympathy with the committee's desire to raise sufficient revenue to balance the Budget, but there must be some element of fairness in the distribution of these taxes. I remind the Senate that practically all of these tires and tubes are used on automobiles and no one can drive an automobile without tires and tubes. So this tax becomes just one more tax upon the operation of automobiles.

The Senate has already shown its disposition not to increase the rates proposed by the House on automobiles. This is a tax on exactly the same people. It is unfair and unreasonable for exactly the same reasons why the increased tax on automobiles was unfair and unreasonable, and, indeed, more so, because the rates here proposed are very much higher than were the rates proposed on automobiles and trucks.

Let me review what the taxes proposed by the committee amendment are: On the first-line tires, the percentage rates, based on the 2¼ cents a pound rate proposed by the committee, run from 5.85 per cent to 7.13 per cent; on second-line tires, the taxes proposed range from 7.2 per cent to 8.33 per cent; on truck tires, they run from 6.07 per cent to 6.95 per cent.

On inner tubes they are still more excessive: On first-line tubes, they range from 9.36 per cent to 13.6 per cent; on second-line tubes, they run from 10.24 per cent to 14.56 per cent.

Is there any reason that can be alleged why a battery, a spark plug, or any other accessory that is a necessary part of an automobile, should be taxed at 2 per cent and a tire at four times as high a rate? Is there any reason why an inner tube should be taxed seven times as high?

I pause for an answer. Is there any answer from the committee as to why an inner tube should be taxed seven times the rate of a battery?

Mr. REED. Does the Senator want the answer now?

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes; I would like to hear an answer.

Mr. REED. Because it is imperative that the revenue be found and this is a convenient place to find it. If we are not going to have a uniform sales tax, a manufacturers' excise tax, we have to pick upon particular industries which are able to pay the revenue. That is the whole answer.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I am glad to have so frank an answer. There is not the slightest contention that there is any fairness in it. It is only a question of dire necessity in raising the revenue.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. The original committee bill, imposing 10 per cent upon tires and inner tubes, was estimated to raise $40,000,000. The change that was made to 2¼ cents a pound on tires and 4 cents a pound on tubes is estimated to raise only about $30,000,000.

Mr. BULKLEY. Thirty million dollars is the Senator's estimate?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. BULKLEY. I will ask the Senator whether the House estimates as to the revenue from the tax on automobiles are substantially correct; that is to say, $44,000,000 at the rate agreed to upon automobiles and $4,000,000 at the rate agreed to on trucks. Is that correct?

Mr. SMOOT. I think those figures are correct. They are the Treasury estimates.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BULKLEY. I would like to comment on these figures first, and then I will yield.

Here is the situation. At the 3 per cent rate on automobiles and 2 per cent on trucks, there would have to be sales of automobiles and trucks amounting to $1,700,000,000 to produce the revenue that is expected, which revenue is $48,000,000.

As compared with that, the Senator proposes to take $30,000,000, about two-thirds as much as the yield on automobiles, out of tires and tubes, sales of which during this year will not exceed $400,000,000.

There can be no fairness in that. Even the argument of the Senator from Pennsylvania as to the necessity for raising revenue can not go so far as to justify that discrimination. I will state again the difference. It is proposed to raise $48,000,000 out of total sales of automobiles and trucks of $1,700,000,000, and it is proposed to raise two-thirds as much out of tires and tubes, with less than one-fourth that volume of sales.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator's conscience is offended by the injustice of taxing tires from 6 to 8 per cent, I dread to think how badly he must have felt when he voted in favor of putting a tax on lubricants which ran up as high as 50 per cent.

Mr. BULKLEY. I did not vote for that tax, and do not believe in it.

Mr. REED. I am glad to know that. We put a tax on matches which runs up to about 30 per cent. We have legislated without regard to the justice of what we were doing to particular industries. We taxed the children's lollipops 2 per cent, under the action taken by the committee this morning; but we exempt the more expensive things which are used by the grown-ups.

Mr. BULKLEY. I appreciate the Senator's admission that there is no justice whatever in it; and I submit that the comparisons which he is making are not as much in point as the comparison which I am making.

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator think that the lubricant which goes into the automobile engine is just as necessary as the tire that goes on its wheels?

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes, Mr. President; and the tax on the lubricant is a perfectly outrageous one. I am utterly opposed to it.

Mr. REED. So am I; but if we are going to tax lubricants up to 50 per cent, we ought to raise the tire tax.

Mr. BULKLEY. I will do my best with the Senator to take the tax off lubricants; but I do not think that tax justifies the tax proposed on tires.

The man who uses the tires is exactly the same man to whom the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] referred night before last. His income is about $2,500 a year. More than two-thirds of all the new cars bought in this country are bought by people with yearly incomes of less than $3,000. More cars are purchased by people with incomes under $1,400 than by those with incomes over $6,500.

Mr. REED. I do not know how anybody knows those statistics so well. But will not the Senator, before he sits down, tell us where to get the revenue if we follow his suggestion and reduce this tax?

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I will answer that very directly. The Senator from Utah, instead of comparing this tax with the tax proposed by the House, is assuming to compare it with a tax that was suggested by the committee to raise $40,000,000.

Since that suggestion was made, and in this very session here this morning, we have picked up more than $40,000,000 of taxes on other items.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, we have to have the revenue from those taxes in order to provide for the action taken by the Senate. We are compelled to raise that amount of money, taking into consideration the amount we are to raise under the tire and tube item. If the tires and tubes are taken out, we will be just that much short.

Mr. BULKLEY. I question whether the Senator's figures will check. The only items on which the committee has been defeated are the taxes on automobiles and trucks, and there is a loss of less than $20,000,000, under the committee estimates, in those items, and certainly we picked up two or three times that amount this morning.

Now I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I am sympathetic with the Senator's position for this reason: A man buys an automobile approximately every two or three years, and he pays one tax upon it at the time of purchase. But during the two or three years' life of an automobile he buys tires and accessories continually. So, leaving the rate alone, it falls with a much greater burden upon the purchaser of tires, making these continuous purchases, than it does upon the original purchaser.

Mr. BULKLEY. Of course it does; and I thank the Senator for that suggestion. That is exactly what it does.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I merely want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that this morning the Finance Committee made it possible to create a deficit of $53,000,000 because of raising the exemption on admissions up to 30 cents and under. They expect to offer an amendment on that basis which will be pretty costly.

Mr. BULKLEY. Of course, that will have to be decided on its merits when we get to it.

Mr. President, I do not wish to detain the Senate longer. I submit that the tax proposed is unfair and unreasonable in itself. It is obviously unreasonable in comparison with the taxes which the Senate has agreed to on automobiles and trucks. The tax falls on the same individual that we undertook to relieve by refusing to consent to the committee's amendment proposing to increase the taxes on automobiles and trucks. I believe the Senate will want to put tires and tubes where they belong and consider them as automobile accessories.

By putting them in with the other accessories and taxing them at the same rate as other accessories we ought to save administrative difficulties concerning the refunds, as proposed by the committee, of the tire tax to manufacturers of automobiles, because the tax on tires as proposed by the committee will impose a tax on the manufacturers of automobiles of the difference between the automobile tax and the tire tax, and that, in addition to an added difficulty of administration, imposes another burden on the motor industry, which we ought not to impose, and which will be eliminated if we can agree upon putting tires and tubes among other automobile accessories.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BULKLEY. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand the Senator is opposed to the committee amendment inserting the words "other than tires and inner tubes" in line 7. If the committee amendment is disagreed to, would that leave the bill satisfactory to the Senator?

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes; except that there are some other amendments of a similar purport that would have to be corrected at other places in the bill; but the principle of defeating the pending amendment would leave the bill exactly the way I think it ought to be.

Mr. President, may we have a vote on the amendment on page 247, so that the Senate may express itself as to whether tires and tubes ought to be included among automobile accessories?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee. The Senator from Ohio asks unanimous consent to vote first upon the committee amendment proposed on page 247.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I hope the chairman of the committee will accede to the request of my colleague to vote on it first.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not think it ought to be done that way. We ought to go forward regularly.

Mr. FESS. Then I want to say something in my own right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The senior Senator from Ohio is recognized.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I have gone along with the committee in voting for many excise taxes. I have accepted what appeared to be the lesser of the evils that have been proposed. We are all agreed that we have not any choice. We must make our income somewhere near what the outgo is to be in order to balance the Budget. I have gone along all the way with the committee on that proposition, voting under protest for a good many things that I would like to be relieved of voting for, but the situation is such that I have no choice.

I do not object to putting a tax on higher incomes. I think it is the proper kind of a tax. It strikes me that the only question that should be dealt with here is whether it would raise the revenue and enable us to do what we have to do. That is the only question involved when I come to voting on a matter like that.

The truth of the matter is that too great a proportion of our revenues is dependent upon the income tax. It is an easy way to get the tax when we have the incomes. It is an impossible way when we do not have the incomes. It is only on that basis that I have persisted and gone along with the committee on the income-tax rates, resisting other suggestions.

I have been sympathetic with what the committee is trying to do, but if we do not get the revenue that way, if it seems impossible to get it that way, then it is a question of either the excise tax or the sales tax. There will be some dispute when we reach that point, and no one at this stage can tell what the Senate will decide to do as between the two. But continuing the course that we must necessarily balance the Budget, I have gone along with the committee and voted against what the House recommended and voted with the Finance Committee on what they recommended. I have done that consistently, with the reason for it that ultimately it would balance the Budget.

On automobiles the House fixed a certain rate. The Senate committee increased that slightly, and I voted under protest with the Senate committee to have its rate adopted. I did it as to paragraph (a) and paragraph (b). I want to do it as to paragraph (c), but I am not to be given the opportunity. Because of some representations from some source the committee put into subsection (a) on page 245 a provision against the rubber item. Of course, I would vote against that as I have voted against every item of tariff on the tax bill. I have stated over and over again that if we could take these special elements that need protection and put them into an emergency tariff bill I would not hesitate but would enthusiastically support them, but I have taken the position, and I am going to continue it, that there ought not to be made out of this tax bill a mere tariff bill.

This item, however, that was put here in the form of a tariff item has been rejected and a substitute is being offered by the committee this morning. It is much better than what has been suggested on page 245, and I am glad that change has been made. But now I want to know why the committee, which has resisted the House provision and been turned down upon it as to automobiles, although not turned down by my vote, will not do the same thing with reference to tires that it has done with reference to the various other parts of automobiles. Why should we make one provision for one part of an automobile and a different provision for another part of the same automobile?

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] made the very frank statement that it is simply in order to get the revenue. I appreciate and sympathize with that view, but I do not think that is the only alternative. On the other hand, time after time this morning we have reversed the recommendations of the committee and taken the House view on different items. We have done that as to more than seven or eight items this morning on the recommendation of the Finance Committee, and the Senate unanimously agreed to the recommendation. Through these votes we certainly have made up a definite amount of revenue that otherwise would be lost, and yet when it comes to the one item on which there is a tremendous effort to inaugurate business in America we are going to penalize it to an enormous percentage above what originally was recommended in the House bill.

In the House bill, on page 245, subsection (c) provided 1 per cent, which was increased by the Finance Committee to 2 per cent for the purpose of this section in subsections (a) and (b), where this percentage is found, including spark plugs, storage batteries, coils, timers, tires, inner tubes, tire chains, and so on. All of those items falling into the category of percentage fixed by the House were included except tires and inner tubes. The committee singles those two items out of the House provision, leaving in all the balance. The only reason they give for it is that we will not get the desired revenue by leaving in spark plugs and other items, so we will strike out tires and tubes in order to put a higher duty on them, leaving the duty on the other items at 2 per cent. In all probability the Senate will reverse it and make it 1 per cent.

Then it is proposed to place in a separate section the two items that we have taken out of this paragraph and impose a tax upon them of 6 or 7 per cent. Not a single reason is given for it except that we can get the revenue there and we are not sure that we can get it anywhere else. Therefore we must leave it in the bill as proposed by the committee. It does not appear to me to be rational that the only exceptions we are to make in the parts of automobiles, taxing them seven or eight times as much as other parts of automobiles, should be these two items. I do not think that lone exception is rational. It is not fair.

In these times when there seems to be an insurmountable wall of an economic tariff over which we can not get, when there is a damming up of all credits and all business activity, it would seem that the venturesomeness that is absolutely necessary if business is to start is being condemned and is being penalized. Everybody is expressing hope. With an enormous amount of money in the country, with the banks filled with money, but nobody else willing to run the risk, here is a group of business men with millions of dollars of investment who are willing to take the risk and to plunge ahead and start the stream over the wall, and in some way or other begin business activity. They are willing to do that, and yet they are to be singled out and penalized for doing the thing we are asking them to do. It is not only inequitable and unfair but it is irrational; it is unsound; and it does not seem to me that it comports with what all of us are attempting to do.

I am reminded of an object lesson that was given to me a few days ago. Some one spoke about a magnificent estate near by that had run down, and when it was asked why that estate had not been improved the reply immediately was made that the owners could not afford to do it; that if that estate were improved, immediately the tax to be imposed would constitute such a penalty that they could not afford to do anything with it; therefore they must leave it unimproved in order to avoid the penalty in the form of taxes which would be imposed by the Government. And that is what is going on here.

I am going with the committee all along in trying to balance the Budget. As I previously stated, I have voted for taxes which seemed to me to be exorbitant, but I had no choice. Now I appeal to my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], who is as much interested in this matter as am I, that we ought not to make this differentiation in subsection C, where the House put on a 1 per cent tax and we have raised it to 2 per cent; we ought not to make the differentiation by striking out tires and inner tubes and penalizing them by a tax seven or eight times as much merely for the sake of raising revenue. It seems to me it is unjustified and uneconomic, and I am hoping that the committee will agree to let the tires and inner tubes remain in this section subject to a flat tax the same as the other items.

Mr. HAWES rose.

Mr. FESS. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HAWES. While one pays one tax on an automobile he will probably pay endless taxes on inner tubes, so this proposed tax is not only excessive, but it is a pyramiding of the tax.

Mr. FESS. The Senator from Missouri is absolutely right; he made that observation a moment ago, and I thought it a very strong comment. In other words, we insist on penalizing these manufacturers for doing business.

So far as it is possible, I want to put the burden where there is a profit; but where the business is running at a loss and there are sufficient courage and patriotism to take the risk of continuing at a loss, I think the proposal further to penalize these manufacturers is wholly without justification. For that reason, I am going to appeal to the Senate committee to treat tires and inner tubes in the same way that they treat the other items. It seems to me that the revenue will not suffer seriously if we shall do that.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, before we vote on this item I merely desire to say that it seems to me the committee has given proper consideration to those engaged in the manufacture of rubber. When this matter was considered in the House the rubber question did not arise. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] was the first one who ever mentioned the subject in the committee. Everyone at that time thought that rubber might be a very good commodity to tax. Consequently there was written into the bill first, I believe, a 5 cents a pound import duty on rubber. Then the thought occurred to us that that was not the best way to deal with the problem. We then changed the duty around to meet the wishes of the tire industry. Their representatives then came before us and we changed the duty again. They again came before us and we once more changed it. I want to read to the Senators a statement which the representatives of the rubber industry presented to the committee. Here is the language they employed:

> We propose to the Senate a plan, and alternates thereof, which will produce the revenue required and which will not destroy industry—> which will not be unfair to the small companies; which will not create monopolies of the large companies by destroying their competition; which will tend to stabilize an industry in great need, and will create a tax which must be passed on to the consumer.
> We started out to raise $53,000,000 from this item—

Then it was, following the appearance of the representatives of the rubber industry before the committee, that the rate was fixed by the committee on casings at 3 cents and on tubes at 5 cents. Some question was raised that that might discriminate in favor of some wholesale dealers. The rate was then reduced to what is now recommended, 2¼ cents a pound on tires and 4 cents on tubes. By those reductions made by the committee after hearing from those interested and listening to their suggestions and trying to work out some plan the committee has lost $20,000,000 in revenue already; and if we shall strike out this provision and merely put a tax on accessories, the committee will lose $33,000,000 more in revenue.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield.

Mr. BULKLEY. The Senator from Mississippi refers to our losing $20,000,000 of revenue. He does not mean to suggest that there ever was any proposal before the committee which would have secured that $20,000,000 other than the ill-advised suggestion of an import tax on rubber, which it has been abundantly demonstrated never would have yielded any such revenue.

Mr. HARRISON. It may have been an ill-advised suggestion——

Mr. BULKLEY. It was an impossible suggestion, and the Senator is talking about losing revenue that would never have been received.

Mr. HARRISON. Here is what the Senator from Mississippi is talking about. It may not be pleasing to the Senator from Ohio, but the fact is that when we first put an import duty of 5 cents on rubber we estimated, according to the Treasury figures, a revenue of $53,000,000. In adopting the other plan, following the suggestions of the rubber interests that it would be more equitable, that it would be fairer, we reduced the amount that it was estimated would be received, provided the recommendations of the committee go through, to $33,000,000. That is why I said we lost $20,000,000 by following the suggestions, in comparison with the revenue we originally started out to get.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, the Treasury estimate of $53,000,000 plus in revenue from import duties was never justified. There never was any possibility of raising any such amount of revenue.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not know; I am stating what the Treasury estimated.

Mr. BULKLEY. The Senator is familiar with the errors the Treasury Department has made.

Mr. HARRISON. I think the Treasury Department has made a number of errors.

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes; and this is one of them.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED. I do not think it was an error. The average imports of rubber for several years past have been over 1,060,000,000 pounds per year. There is not one pound of it produced in the United States; we must import it. Of course, if the tariff duty were levied, there would be a temporary check in importations. The companies that have large inventories, which some of them have, would use up their tax-free inventories, but the smaller companies would have to import, and, after a year or so, they would all have to import, and the $53,000,000 estimate would be amply justified.

Mr. HARRISON. It was stated that there were stocks on hand and afloat, I believe, of 378,756,000 pounds, but they were in the hands of the big concerns and not the small ones.

Mr. BULKLEY. But the Budget we are trying to balance is for next year. The Senator from Pennsylvania quite freely admits that importations would be checked; so that there would surely not be $53,000,000, and possibly no revenue at all, from that source during the year for which we are making these valiant efforts to balance the Budget.

Mr. SMOOT. That is why the change was made.

Mr. BULKLEY. I am not taking exception to the change; the change was very wise; but I am taking exception to the presumption that $53,000,000 would be lost. There could not be anything lost in this instance, because we never had that revenue. The entire schedule of taxes in this bill only runs for a 2-year period, and we would not get $53,000,000 the first year, and would not get $53,000,000 the second year. It is perfectly clear that the Treasury in making the estimate of $53,000,000 did so simply on the basis of importations over a period of one, two, or three years—I think it was three years—and did not take into consideration the fact that imports have been exceedingly large during that period owing to the fact that the price of rubber has been going down and purchasers have been fooled several times as to the price level at which it would be a good place to stock up.

Mr. HARRISON. What I say to the Senator is that when we incorporated this item in the bill on the suggestion of the Treasury Department, with an estimate of $53,000,000 of revenue from rubber, that entered into the calculations in balancing the Budget, and when we now strike out $20,000,000 of it, we have got to raise that amount from some other source; and if we strike out $33,000,000 more we will have to tap some other reservoir.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRISON. Already, may I say to the Senator from Ohio, even if we adopt the committee's recommendation on the rubber item, we will still be $30,000,000 short of balancing the Budget; because, although we have adopted various amendments brought in here to-day designed to yield, I think, something between $60,000,000 and $70,000,000, we took off the other day—I may not be exactly correct—about $20,000,000; and the Committee on Finance is going to recommend making the exemption in the case of the tax on admissions 30 cents and under. That will entail a further loss of revenue of $53,000,000. If we continue to strike out this and that, we can see that, after a while, we will have no revenue left. I hope that the amendment as recommended by the Committee on Finance will be adopted.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. FESS. If we should lose the $20,000,000 on this item, I understand that by placing back in the bill the tax on cosmetics we will make up that amount.

Mr. HARRISON. We will make up about $12,000,000 on the cosmetics item.

Mr. FESS. Have there not been put back in the bill a number of other taxes?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and in the total, including cosmetics and the other items, the yield will be somewhere between $60,000,000 and $70,000,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I think he has placed the estimate a little high. I think the amount of revenue which will be obtained from the taxes referred to will be $58,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. I will accept the suggestion; around $60,000,000.

Mr. FESS. We still have the alternative of putting a tax either on rubber, on the automobile users, or of putting it on the people who go to picture shows.

Mr. HARRISON. May I say to the Senator I voted in the committee to have no exemption on admissions, because I thought that was one source from which we could obtain $110,000,000 of revenue.

Mr. FESS. That is where I would go for it.

Mr. HARRISON. But I realize that the motion-picture people have made such headway that they are going to be able to have the exemption lowered. We had hoped that the committee recommendation of an exemption of 30 cents and under would be accepted by the Senate, and, while by that we would lose $53,000,000 in revenue, if we should accept the House provision of an exemption on admissions of 45 cents and under we would lose $80,000,000. So we are merely trying to get revenue in proceeding in that way.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator must remember, too, that on yesterday on the two items touching automobiles and trucks we lost $16,000,000 of revenue from that source.

Mr. FESS. I voted with the Senator on those items.

Mr. HARRISON. I know the Senator did.

Mr. FESS. I should like to ask the Senator another question. The House provided a tax on tires and inner tubes of 1 per cent, did it not?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes.

Mr. FESS. Did not the House have before it the facts as to the Treasury situation?

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, I suppose they did; but the Senator will recall that they put on some other taxes to raise revenue which the Senate committee has knocked out. They put on a normal tax on dividends of corporations amounting to $80,000,000. They sought to raise $74,000,000 from stock transfers. We thought that would be unfair to business, and so forth, so we struck out those taxes, and we are trying to deal with the matter in this way. The rubber people say it will not destroy their industry. No doubt they do not want it. Nobody wants it. We do not like to put it on them; but if we strike out this item, we will be striking out a revenue of $33,000,000, and it is going to be difficult to go out and get this money from some other source. I do not know where we are going to get it.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, I do not mean to strike it out. I mean to include it as the House put it.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; but we would get only about $3,000,000 from that source if we put it on accessories.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] asks unanimous consent to vote first upon the committee amendment on page 247, and then to vote upon the amendment of the committee proposed this morning. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BULKLEY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, as one Senator, I find it very difficult to vote for these committee amendments.

I may say that I am not satisfied personally with any of the results we are accomplishing. There is no doubt that the charge that we are attempting to pick out special industries for taxation is true. It is quite doubtful in many cases whether it is entirely fair or whether it will obtain the results that we seek.

If I were only satisfied with balancing the Budget as the Budget seems to be anticipated by the administration, it would not be a matter that would be very material to me; but as one of those who feel that it is essential in some way to raise more money to meet destitution in this country and to carry on the productive works of the Federal Government, I feel that this whole process of raising money is going to be unsatisfactory.

I have constantly opposed a manufacturers' tax or a sales tax because I believe that it is in the nature of a per capita tax. I think the fairest tax we ever inaugurated in this country was the income tax. It is based on a sound principle, in my opinion. We are told, however, that there is a limit to the return from an income tax as the rate is raised. That may be true to a certain extent; but I do not believe it is absolutely true in any sense of the word, because I believe that the experience of the income-tax collections in England absolutely refutes it.

I have always wondered how Great Britain could collect income taxes all the way from twice to ten times as high as our income taxes, even during periods of depression far greater than ours at the time they were collected, and without complaint. The theory that if we do not collect income taxes the incomes not collected will go into industry has not proven to be a fact. The enormous amount of capital in the banks of the country to-day is not going into industry. When industry has five times as much money already invested in it as it can earn a reasonable rate upon, no more money is going to be put in it. Industry is not going to borrow money when it can not make a profit on it above the interest. Banks are not going to lend money to industries that can not make a profit on their business.

I realize that this legislation is only emergency legislation that will exist, I believe, for a period of two years—at least, it should be limited to that. We should treat it exactly as war emergency legislation, in my judgment. I believe that the legislators in this body and in the other House will have to reach a compromise. Human nature has manifested itself here in a way that everyone understands. Everyone wants to raise revenue to balance the Budget, and yet the constituents of every Senator here are opposed to a tax on those things that they produce. That attitude is reflected in the votes of Senators, and it is natural that it should reflect itself in their votes.

I wish to state personally that I have arrived at the point where I am prepared and willing to vote for a manufacturers' sales tax along the lines suggested by the Ways and Means Committee of the House, with the exceptions provided in the report of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, provided that those in this body who have opposed an increase in the income taxes over and above those reported in this bill by the Finance Committee are also willing to make concessions and vote for a substantial increase in the income taxes over and above those reported in the bill coming from the Finance Committee.

If that is done, the people of this country will make a sacrifice in bearing an increased burden which they can not well afford to bear, and the capitalists of this country will bear a burden far greater than now for the more rapid balancing of the Budget, and—what to me is far more important—the furnishing of an extra supply of funds to the Federal Government for meeting the tremendous emergency that now confronts this country.

Mr. President, I sincerely hope that the members of the Finance Committee will enter into a conference immediately with those who have most intensely opposed an increase in the income-tax schedules to ascertain whether or not that kind of compromise can be brought about, and let us cease the character of contest that is now going on.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me suggest to the Senator that it will not do a bit of good to have the Finance Committee reconvene to discuss the income-tax rates. The Finance Committee is against any increase. They tell us, as did the Senator from Pennsylvania yesterday, that the country is facing a tremendous situation, and all that sort of thing, but they will not raise the rates a dollar, because they say that it would drive all the wealth into tax-exempt securities.

That is in the face of the fact, let me say to the Senator, who adverted to the British situation, that in Great Britain the income tax starts with incomes of $800, with a 12½ per cent normal tax, and runs up to as high as 66 per cent. That is what the British do, and the British have not any general sales tax, either.

The committee and the Senate have voted down the rates proposed by myself, and the rates proposed by the distinguished senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], and whatever is done about the income tax is going to have to be done here on the floor of the Senate. There is no sense having the committee kill any more time, because the committee is not going to do what the Senator suggests. I will say, however, that the committee does not represent my views, as the Senator very well knows.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator from Texas and the Senator from Nevada have both referred to the very high income taxes paid and collected in England. In England there is not an enormous amount of tax-exempt securities on the market ready to be picked up, which in this country exceed $20,000,000,000 in value. That is the reason why it is so easy for those who have to pay very high taxes in this country to escape, and why in England it is easy to collect high taxes, because there are no tax exempts.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I am not interested in the question as to whether capitalists can escape in this country and can not escape in England. I am interested only in the question as to whether or not those Senators who are in closest touch with income-tax payers are willing to increase the burdens on them to a reasonable extent, if those who are in touch probably more closely with the poor people in this country are willing to join them in settling this whole question of distributed taxation by voting for a manufacturers' sales tax.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator think that when we have raised the income taxes on large incomes to 54 per cent, we have gone up about as far as reason would justify our going?

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator is dealing with the highest brackets. I am dealing, in my mind, with the intermediate brackets, on which far more income could be raised.

Take, for instance, the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas, called the Connally amendment, based on the 1922 rates. I am not competent to say whether or not that is an ideal scale, but it was in existence in this country for a while. That was proposed and voted down by a vote of 46 to 31. The rates were not nearly as high as those in the amendment offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] on the higher brackets. They were just as high, if not higher, on some of the intermediate brackets.

What I want to know now is whether it is impossible for those who feel that they represent the poor people of this country, on account of the localities, we will say, in which they live, where poor people do exist, to meet with those who represent constituencies where the great wealth of the country is in increasing the burdens of both classes so as to avoid the constant skipping around the edge of whether or not we are going to balance the Budget; and, even if we balance the Budget, whether we will have anything left after we balance it with which to meet the real obligations of this Government toward its destitute people and its unemployed. That is what I want to know.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think we have already gone more than half way in that direction. We have more than doubled the income taxes which will be paid by all classes of income-tax payers from the smallest to the biggest. We know that if we raise those income-tax rates further on the big incomes the yield will be perfectly negligible. We can tax the big incomes up to 80 per cent if we wish, and we would not add more than four or five million dollars to the revenue of the United States, because those incomes have well-nigh disappeared.

Having more than doubled the income-tax rates, is it unfair or unreasonable to ask the Senate to consider a general manufacturers' excise which will exempt the food of the poor man, which will exempt the clothing of the poor man, which will exempt the medicine he uses, which will exempt the fertilizer and the agricultural implements the farmer buys, which will exempt the tools of the workman? Tell me, pray, after we have excluded rent, food, clothing, and tools, how much there is left in the spending of the average poor man, about whom we are talking, to bear this manufacturers' excise tax? Have we not gone to the extreme of reasonableness when we have made those concessions of which I speak?

Mr. PITTMAN. What does the rich man buy that the ordinary farmer and the ordinary laborer is not entitled to buy?

Mr. REED. What does he have that the ordinary man does not? All that great group of luxuries and comforts which the rich man is able to get for himself; and we tax every one of those. The human stomach is about the same size, regardless of the wealth of its owner. A man can eat only a certain amount, and can wear only a certain amount. But when we get into the class of the luxury purchases, when we get into the class of all the purchases in general industry——

Mr. PITTMAN. What are the luxury purchases? What does the Senator call "luxuries"?

Mr. REED. I should suppose the Senator would know as well as I.

Mr. PITTMAN. The Senator has them in mind. I want to know what is a luxury for a rich man that is not a luxury for a poor man, what a rich man enjoys that a poor man is not supposed to enjoy. Name some of them.

Mr. REED. Think of all the articles which go to decorate the house of the Senator from Nevada, or the homes of the rest of us, for that matter—all the rugs, totally tax free under this bill; all the paintings on the wall, totally tax free under this bill. We are taxing the baby's lollipop, which costs a cent. We tax the chewing gum which some school child will use. But the rich man may fill his house with treasures from around the globe, and he gets them in tax free. All he spends to get himself additional comfort is tax free. The fur coat he wears, if you please, and all such things, we exempt from taxes. Then we tax the humbler things, like the little mechanical refrigerator, perhaps, or the two or three dollar camera, or the $5 watch. Those things we tax, and we think we are making a sound sales tax out of this bill. I say that if we would make it uniform, we could strike out all these wretched nuisance taxes against which Senators, first from one State and then another, are protesting.

I agree with the Senators from Ohio that the tax proposed on tires is a highly unfair tax. It is only made necessary by the refusal of the Senate to do the logical thing and put a low tax on everything.

I agree with the Senators from Michigan that the tax on automobiles is indefensible. There is no reason why their industry should be picked out for slaughter, and every brickyard and tannery and what not should go scot free. There is no sense in that. But it is the way this bill is constructed.

I agree with the Senators from Nevada and the other Western States that there is no reason for singling out silver for an exception in taxation. Everything ought to go in under a very low general tax, such as that proposed by the Senator from Montana. Those Senators are perfectly right when they complain. But their complaint should not be directed to the committee. The committee has been forced to resort to these special taxes. Yet no one can see their unfairness more clearly than I.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania just exactly what class of people he would like to reach by the sales tax who ought not to be reached by increased income taxes?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I would like to reach that great multitude of the American citizenry which is able to spend for something more than the necessities of life.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly.

Mr. REED. And that is what the manufacturers' excise tax would do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Would not the income tax do just exactly the same thing?

Mr. REED. Absolutely not. We know that it does not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Why not?

Mr. REED. Because the figures show that only about half a million people pay the vast bulk of the income taxes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The figures given us here show that those having incomes of from $5,000 to $50,000 pay the great bulk of the revenue that would be realized under the amendment proposed either by the Senator from Texas or the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. REED. Yet under that figure of $5,000 go hundreds of millions and billions of dollars of expenditures for luxuries.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly. It is the people having the small incomes, lower than $2,000, whom the Senator desires to reach.

Mr. REED. Absolutely not.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Very well. If it is those with incomes above $5,000, then, why are they not reached by the income taxes? They pay only when they have net incomes. These others the Senator desires to reach do not have any net incomes. If they did, they would fall under the income tax laws. He wants to reach those who do not pay on net incomes.

Mr. REED. Perhaps the Senator knows what I want better than I do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I should have said, the logical result of what the Senator desires.

Mr. REED. I was not offended. I ought to add that there are to-day in the United States many great fortunes which are utterly untouchable under our income tax laws, and suggestive cases will instantly spring to the Senator's mind, I know, many very rich men whose capital is so invested that it is beyond our reach in income taxation.

I think, for example, of the William Rockefeller estate, which was almost entirely invested in tax frees. The only way we can reach a man of that sort and make him contribute his fair share toward the cost of government is by taxing his spending, because he and others like him are firmly intrenched behind a mass of more than $20,000,000,000 of totally tax-exempt securities.

When we come to contrast our income tax with the British, there are two things we must bear in mind. The first is that they do not have that problem of tax-free securities that we have. The second is that they do not include in income capital gains in the sense that we do. It is possible for one in Great Britain to create a fortune practically tax free. It is not possible in the United States.

When we talk of taxing the large incomes, I beg the Senator to remember that most of the so-called large incomes that are reached by the higher rates are the products of the labor, the toil, the perseverance, and the risk of the men who are creating wealth. They are not the incomes which are settled returns from invested capital; and experience shows that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to add just a thought to what he has said?

Mr. REED. Gladly.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Furthermore, in this country the several States impose income taxes, a situation which is not found in Great Britain.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nevada, who has been very kind, will indulge me just a moment further, I desire to say that apparently the one answer to raising revenue from income taxes, so far as it is necessary to do so, is the tax-exempt-security matter.

The Senator tells us that these tax-exempt securities are in the hands of the great wealthy people of the country. The Senator ought to give us some information on the matter. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], it seems to me, really disposed of that contention most effectively the other day when he showed us the total amount of tax-exempt securities in the great estates of the country that pay estate taxes. That is the basis upon which we must form our conclusions, as it seems to me. What have the great estates shown in respect to the ownership of tax-exempt securities? I think it is perfectly gratuitous to say that the tax-exempt securities are held by the great estates and are not held by the small investors, widows, small estates, and that sort of thing.

Mr. REED. No matter by whom they are held they ought to be taxed. The Senator from Michigan gave us a list of several hundred estates the other day.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. My understanding was he gave us all of the estates with all of the tax-exempt securities and pointed out certain estates as indicative of the amount they hold.

Mr. REED. He gave us a list of several hundred, I believe. Perhaps the Senator from Michigan can tell us how many there were.

Mr. COUZENS. There were 285 estates of decedents who died from December 1, 1928, to January 31, 1932, and I gave only those in excess of $3,000,000. Of that amount there was $2,700,000,000 of assets and only $300,000,000 in tax-exempt securities.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. And the Senator gave us the total amount of the assets during that period and the total amount of tax-exempt securities.

Mr. REED. And there were only $300,000,000 of tax-exempt securities. Let us consider that for a moment. There were over $316,000,000 total tax-free securities in those estates. The total assets appraised as of the date of death was $2,700,000,000. At this present moment we all know by our own experiences that the common stocks that made up the great mass of that inflated value have shrunk to about 10 per cent of their value in 1929. If we were to take those same estates to-day, and make the same comparison, I venture to say the tax-frees would constitute over 50 per cent of the net value of the estates.

In many of the States, and I looked over the list, the tax-free securities constituted more than 50 per cent of the total value of the estates even of people who died when their common stocks were selling at boom prices, and to-day they would constitute 90 per cent or more of those same estates.

We have typical cases. Take the Donnelly case in Chicago that has been talked of so much. He died supposedly worth many, many millions. Most of the property of the estate was Montgomery Ward stock. To-day it will not sell for enough to pay the Federal estate tax, but the survivors of that group have very, very large amounts of it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It seems to me that when we come to consider what the investor does with his money the big investor who is subject to the income tax, we ought to take into consideration what he does in normal times, and not what he does under these depressed conditions.

Mr. REED. Very good. When we consider that we are now taxing the highest brackets 45 per cent surtax under the bill, plus 9 per cent normal tax; when we consider that we are denying to those taxpayers the right to deduct their losses on securities except in so far as they are matched by capital gains or gains on securities during that year; when we consider that the same taxpayers have to pay in many States income taxes to the separate States, then we realize that the burden of tax that we are piling on the so-called big fortunes approaches confiscation.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Leaving out of consideration the big taxes, they are obliged to pay the taxes anyway. It is a question of whether we will tax them upon their incomes or upon what they buy. It is simply a question as to where we are going to put the weight of the thing.

Mr. REED. Of course, that is true. The taxes we gather here in Washington are going to come from living beings who constitute the American Nation. The problem is whether we are going to base that tax system solely upon that narrow base which is the net income of a limited number of persons, or whether we are going to put it on the broader and more stable base of the spending of a whole citizenry over and above the necessities of life. It seems to me that a proper tax system may well include both features.

We have seen it proven very clearly that net income tends to disappear entirely in times like this. The base of the tax disappears. The yield of the personal-income tax has fallen this year to something like one-fifth of what it was two years ago—and why? Because the base, the income on which it is founded, has itself disappeared.

I am not pleading for the abolition of the income tax, but I am saying that a sound fiscal system will include also levies upon something more stable than net income. When we come to the spending of the people for those things above bare necessities, we have a more stable base that will stand us in good stead in times of depression like this.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I deduce from the entire speech of the Senator from Pennsylvania in answer to my question just two things: The first argument is that we can not collect much. Let us try that. That will end and dispose of that argument.

His argument against the injustice of it has not been very forceful. In fact, I am not sure that we need any argument against the principle of people paying taxes in cases of emergency in proportion to their ability to pay. But I will come back to the proposition of asking him what the farmers as a class, who are very poor now, should not have that the rich should have because it is a luxury. He spoke of a carpet. Nearly every farmer in the country in the past had a carpet. They are entitled to have them even now, but I doubt if they are able to buy any more. He spoke of hangings on windows. Every farmer in the past has had hangings of some kind on windows, probably not as valuable as some other hangings, but nevertheless they had hangings on their windows. I know of nothing—with the exception of a few things we might say like expensive paintings by fine artists or great pieces of jewelry—which under the manufacturers' tax would not reach most of the poor people of the country. I think the effort to try to distinguish between what the poor people can not have and what the rich people have applies to only a few things.

I think the Senate will conclude—and so will the country, from the colloquy that has taken place here—that if we of the Senate, who are identified with a constituency of poor people, are willing to compromise by submitting to a per capita tax on them in the nature of a manufacturers' tax, then it is our duty to insist that all money necessary above that, for taking care of the destitute in this country and the relief of unemployment, shall be obtained out of the incomes of the people of the country. When we place a manufacturers' tax on top of them, we place on them all that can be placed and therefore we have to seek for the rest of the necessary funds from the income tax.

I would otherwise be totally unwilling to vote to place this burden upon the poor of my constituency—and they are practically all poor to-day because they are farmers and miners, members of destroyed industries. But I would do it if there would be taken out of proposed legislation the cutting down by 10 per cent of the salaries of Federal employees, whose salaries never did move up as did the wages and salaries of private industry. I say when it is attempted to cut down by 10 per cent the salary of the wage earner, it is a proposal to take 10 per cent of his capital, not of his income.

Every wage earner in the employ of the Government spends every cent he has every month because he could not live decently without doing it. When he becomes ill and can not earn a wage his capital is gone. When the man who lends a million dollars becomes ill his capital is drawing interest and an income. Take 10 per cent off that million dollars of capital and we take far more from him than we would by taking all of his income, because we are taking that which earns income. But I say that when we take away 10 per cent of the necessary living expenses of the wage earner we are taking away 10 per cent of his capital, because every cent of it is necessary to his existence.

I am endeavoring to urge the Senate to do something bold, something unselfish, not only for the purpose of taking away the capital tax of 10 per cent on the wage earners of the country, not alone for the purpose of balancing a budget that means bare existence, but for the purpose of balancing a budget that does away with the necessity of this cut of 10 per cent in the wages of those people and, in addition, that which will make available to the Treasury of the United States enough money to meet its necessary duty toward the destitute of the country where the local authorities, the municipalities and the States, have found that they have exhausted all their resources.

I want a sufficient fund for the purpose of enabling the Government to go on with its normal and natural development in the country. It can not be done under the terms of this bill as it is now before us, and we know it is impossible. Therefore I am willing to vote for the per capita tax if Senators on the other side of the Chamber have enough bold and unselfish courage to face the necessity of increasing the income tax upon the income-tax payers of the country. If they are unwilling to meet that compromise, then, of course, I will financially die with the poor constituents of my State like those Senators will probably die with the rich constituents of their States.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. PITTMAN. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I say to the Senator that when he is proposing a meeting of minds and joint action between those two schools of thought—the one which believes in a higher income tax, the other which believes in a broader manufacturers' production-tax base—he is reflecting precisely my own state of mind; and I hope he persists in his aspiration. I think the 1922 income-tax rates should be joined with a manufacturers' production tax, with necessities exempted, which would permit the elimination of all special taxes from the bill and create a simplified and equitable and reliable revenue.

Mr. PITTMAN. Then, Mr. President, the rather presumptuous injection of myself into this debate is entirely justified by the statement of the Senator from Michigan. I had been discouraged by the hopeless statement of the Senator from Pennsylvania, but now I know in my own mind that there are enough Senators of a broad and unselfish vision such as the Senator from Michigan on the other side of the Chamber and on this side of the Chamber to get together and reach a compromise whereby we shall do our duty in levying taxes equitably and fairly upon all the people of this country and thus end this foolish talk about balancing an insufficient Budget; to the effect that the credit of the Government is not good; that it can not pay its bonds; that it can not do its normal natural work as a government; that it can not perform its duty toward its destitute. When that shall have been accomplished this whole situation will end. While probably we can not get the Finance Committe to act, because they have reached a distracted condition in which we can not expect them to act, there are individual Senators in this body, such as the Senator from Michigan and Senators on this side, who will meet informally; and I think we have enough votes, including both sides of the Chamber, to pass legislation of the character I have suggested without regard to the pessimistic speeches that have been made on either side of the Chamber.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I desire the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania in respect to a query which I wish to make of him. I address myself to the Senator from Pennsylvania, who is, as we know, an eminent and influential member of the Finance Committee. I am attracted by his statement in the colloquy we have just heard that this vast amount of tax-exempt securities ought to be taxed. I am greatly moved to the thought that that suggestion ought to receive affirmance in very high direction; and I should like to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania to inform me if, in his legal opinion, which is respected in this body, he can conceive of a way to tax those securities that have already been issued? How far have we the power to strike out the exemption and put a limitation upon it and impose a tax upon those securities as they now rest in the possession of their owners?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am very clear that we have not the power to subject tax-exempt securities to the income tax as such. We, of course, have the power to tax them under the estate tax and under the gift tax, but the income accruing annually on such securities is beyond our power to tax, as has been decided by the Supreme Court of the United States. My thought is that a manufacturers' excise tax—sales tax—does to some extent reach the spending of that tax-free income. That was the thought I was trying to express.

Mr. LEWIS. I will say to my able friend that I conferred with my colleague here at my side, the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], for whose legal opinion we all likewise have great respect, as we have for that of the Senator from Pennsylvania, and I dare offer the thought that these tax-exempt securities nevertheless from now on at the instance of the Government could have a burden laid upon them by the Government in the form of a tax for the enjoyment of income contracted in the body of the bond, and in that manner obtain from them a proportion of tax relief; but lawyers such as my friend the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] and my friend the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], I think, do not agree to my idea.

I must therefore say that if the Senator from Pennsylvania, an active and conscientious member of the Finance Committee, can, upon reflection, see no relief in the way of the taxation of such securities as are marked tax exempt, what avail in any way, so far as providing revenue for the Federal Government are the tax-exempt securities issued by our Government in any form whatever?

Mr. REED. The only way we can reach them is through the estate or gift tax.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator mean the Federal estate tax or the State estate tax?

Mr. REED. Both.

Mr. LEWIS. Possibly so. I thank the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, it is quite apparent that the Senate Committee on Finance is undergoing to a degree the same treatment which was accorded the recommendations of the Ways and Means Committee in the House. Nobody likes to pay taxes. A program was proposed there, possibly hurriedly, possibly without the alternatives being well understood. The Senate has had the benefit of the discussion in and the experience of the House, and now the Finance Committee is beginning to secure the benefit of the experience of the Members of the Senate.

We have had two income-tax proposals before us, one a very extreme measure, as I thought, offered by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS]; then there were the income-tax proposals reported by the committee; but in between there came what was called the Connally amendment. I voted against that amendment; but we are rapidly approaching a time when we must send to the House a definite program. Is it not a fair compromise to put an added burden on incomes to the extent provided in the Connally amendment and then get rid of the "nuisance" taxes? We have seen the injustice of those taxes.

Senators are not going to vote for a tax on checks, in my opinion, when they know what it means. I do not believe they will tax amusements, because if there is ever a period in a nation's history when its citizens want and need amusement it is when the nation is in distress.

I believe that out of this confusion there is going to be evolved a compromise plan that will involve a limited manufacturers' license tax, eliminating medicines, eliminating clothing, eliminating food, eliminating agriculture, and confining it to a few commodities. Such a tax would bring a definite, certain sum of money; the rates of the CONNALLY income-tax proposal would bring another definite sum, and the two together would balance the Budget in the most painless way of which I know, to both the consumers and those who pay income taxes.

Senators may call it a compromise if they please, but to me it is just an intelligent understanding of the situation which has developed through no fault of the House and no fault of the Senate, but because of the unusual emergency that confronts our Nation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the pending amendment.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 247, line 7, after the word "accessories" it is proposed to insert the words "other than tires and inner tubes."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BULKLEY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on the committee amendment on page 247, line 7.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I have said all I want to say in the way of argument on the tire-tube tax; but I desire to take one minute to make sure that the Senate understands the question that is being voted upon.

Tires and tubes were taxed, along with other accessories, at 1 per cent as the bill passed the House. The Senate Committee on Finance recommended an increase in that tax to 2 per cent, and last night the Senate voted that increase. Now the pending amendment is proposed by the committee to lift out tires and tubes from the other accessories, with the intention on the part of the committee of proposing a special tax on tires and tubes which runs as high as four times the tax on other accessories as applied to tires, and as high as seven times that tax as applied to tubes.

The effect of defeating the committee amendment now about to be voted upon—which I hope will be defeated—will be to leave tires and tubes as they should be, under the definition of accessories, and tax them at 2 per cent. This will yield a revenue of about $3,500,000 more than the tire and tube tax in the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BULKLEY. Yes.

Mr. KING. Is not this in part, at least, to take the place of the proposed tax upon rubber, which had many advocates?

The Senator knows that before the committee the plan was suggested, and some of the rubber men, as I understand, acceded to it, that there should be an excise tax upon rubber. That was eliminated; and this, in part, takes the place of that.

Mr. BULKLEY. I am familiar, of course, with the fact that a tax was proposed on imports of rubber, and it was advocated by some members of the tire trade—possibly some of those who had large stocks of rubber on hand which would be valorized by an import tax. It was not approved by the majority of the rubber trade and would never have yielded the amount of revenue which the Treasury estimated.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply want to say that this amendment was put in here according to the representations made to the committee by interested parties in the rubber business.

We first imposed on raw rubber a tax of 5 cents a pound. Then the committee ascertained that the amount of rubber on hand was such that we would get no substantial revenue from that tax during the coming year. Then the question arose where we should get the revenue to cover the amount that we expected to get from raw rubber. We discussed this question with the rubber people themselves, and we then decided to put a tax upon tires and tubes.

After that the question came up whether tires and tubes should include the steel rim and other steel parts of the tire. Then we rewrote the amendment and eliminated that and put the tax upon the rubber itself.

I want to say further that this particular amendment appears on page 247, line 7. There are about three or four similar amendments, the wording being "other than tires and inner tubes."

I sincerely trust that after what the committee has done to try to follow, as best it could, the wishes of those interested in this industry, they are going now to support the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the committee on page 247, line 7.

Mr. HARRISON. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HASTINGS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as heretofore with reference to my pair, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote. If privileged to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I am unable to secure a transfer and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BYRNES. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will report the next amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 245, strike out lines 5 to 10, both inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 602. TAX ON TIRES AND INNER TUBES

There is hereby imposed upon the following articles sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax at the following rates:

(1) Tires wholly or in part of rubber, 2¼ cents a pound on total weight (exclusive of metal rims or rim bases), to be determined under regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary.

(2) Inner tubes (for tires) wholly or in part of rubber, 4 cents a pound on total weight, to be determined under regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Utah whether we may not have this amendment considered as part of the other section, for the reason I suggested this morning?

Mr. SMOOT. Why not take this up now and vote upon it and follow it with the other section?

Mr. BULKLEY. I see no objection to that course if it is the understanding that the adjustment as to sections is to be made later.

Mr. SMOOT. I have the amendment in my hand I desire to offer, and we might just as well vote on it now and then take up the other section.

Mr. BULKLEY. I want to offer an amendment to the committee amendment, as proposed, to strike out 2¼ cents a pound and insert 2 cents, on tires, and to strike out 4 cents a pound on tubes and to insert 2 cents.

I am assuming, now, that the Senate wants to tax tires and tubes at a poundage rate, and I am suggesting a lower rate than that proposed by the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. What is the Senator's proposed rate?

Mr. BULKLEY. Two cents on both tires and tubes, which will be a substantial increase, as compared with the rates on other accessories, and only slightly less than what the committee proposes.

Mr. SMOOT. I know it is slightly less, but we have already reduced these other rates, and we have tried to balance the whole tax system, beginning with rubber, and going on down to the finished automobile. From all the information we could get, the rates proposed are those necessary to bring about a proper balance, as nearly as possible.

Mr. BULKLEY. Of course, Mr. President, this very morning the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] frankly admitted that there was no justice at all in this rate, and that it was only a question of balancing the Budget. If we must stand for a rate that seems too high, at least I hope that these rates on tubes, which run up as high as 14½ per cent of the value of the tubes, will not prevail. A 2-cent-a pound rate seems to be much more equitable, although I think even that is too high.

Mr. SMOOT. This is approximately about 6 to 8 per cent, taking the whole of the amendment.

Mr. BULKLEY. On tires; but on tubes it runs much higher than that. On tubes the lowest rate is 9.36 per cent, and the highest rate runs up to 14.56 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. This is a great deal less percentage than the original duty proposed on tires.

Mr. BULKLEY. I know that; but I never conceded that there was any merit in the original proposition.

Mr. SMOOT. Thirty million dollars is involved in this.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BULKLEY] to the committee amendment.

Mr. BULKLEY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, and the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I submit another amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 248, after line 12, insert a new subsection, as follows:

(e) If tires or inner tubes on which tax has been imposed under this title are sold on or in connection with, or with the sale of, a chassis, body, or motor cycle, there shall (under regulations prescribed by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary) be credited against the tax under this section an amount equal to, in the case of an automobile truck chassis or body, 2 per cent, and in the case of any other automobile chassis or body or motor cycle, 3 per cent—

(1) of the purchase price (less, in the case of tires, the part of such price attributable to the metal rim or rim base) if such tires or inner tubes were taxable under section 602 (relating to tax on tires and inner tubes); or

(2) if such tires or inner tubes were taxable under section 609 (relating to use by manufacturer, producer, or importer), then of the price (less, in the case of tires, the part of such price attributable to the metal rim or rim base) at which such or similar tires or inner tubes are sold in the ordinary course of trade by manufacturers, producers, or importers thereof, as determined by the commissioner.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just a brief statement. This amendment provides that when a car manufacturer has purchased tires from a tire manufacturer who has paid the tax at the pound rates on the tires, and the car manufacturer sells the tires on an automobile or a truck which is taxed at 3 or 2 per cent, this second tax on the tires may be offset by giving the car or truck manufacturer a credit at the rate paid on the car or truck on the price he paid for the tires, or, if he imported the tires himself, based on the price on which the 10 per cent tax was calculated. I suppose the Senator from Ohio does not object to that.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I am entirely in accord with this amendment, but I would like to inquire of the Senator whether these rates of refund are correct.

Mr. SMOOT. Those figures have already been corrected in the amendment I have sent to the desk.

Mr. BULKLEY. I am in accord with the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer another amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 259, line 12, in the amendment of the committee, after the word "article," insert "(other than a tire or inner tube)."

Mr. SMOOT. That is made necessary in this case on account of the amendment just agreed to by the Senate, and there are one or two other places where the same amendment will have to be inserted.

Mr. BULKLEY. That is consistent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 259, line 25, in the amendment of the committee, strike out the words "any article" and insert the words "the sale of any article (other than a tire or inner tube)."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I send another amendment to the desk, which I desire to offer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 261, strike out, in the committee amendment, beginning with line 7, down to and including line 18, as follows:

If any person manufactures, produces, or imports an article for his own use (other than use as material in the manufacture or production of, or as a component part of, another article to be manufactured or produced by him which will be taxable under this title or sold free of tax by virtue of section 607, relating to sale of articles for further manufacture) he shall be liable for tax under this title in the same manner as if such article was sold by him, and the tax shall be computed on the price at which such or similar articles are sold, in the ordinary course of trade, by manufacturers, producers, or importers thereof, as determined by the commissioner.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not know whether the amendment on page 247, lines 11 and 12, to strike out the words "tires, inner tubes," was acted upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That amendment has not been acted on.

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to have it agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 247, line 11, strike out the words "tires, inner tubes."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. The next amendment is on page 257, line 15, under the paragraph relating to retail sales.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 257, the committee report to strike out beginning with line 15, down to and including line 3, on page 258, as follows:

SEC. 617. RETAIL SALES

If any manufacturer, producer, or importer liable under this title for tax based on the price for which any articles are sold by him customarily sells such articles both at wholesale and at retail, the tax in the case of any article sold by him at retail shall be computed on the price for which like articles are sold by him at wholesale.

SEC. 618. SALES FOR LESS THAN FAIR MARKET PRICE

If any person sells an article to any person (otherwise than through an arm's-length transaction) at less than the fair market price, the tax under this title on the sale of such article shall (if based on the price for which sold) be computed on the fair market price of such article.

And to insert:

SEC. 606. SALE PRICE

(a) In determining, for the purposes of this title, the price for which an article is sold, there shall be included any charge for coverings and containers of whatever nature, and any charge incident to placing the article in condition packed ready for shipment, but there shall be excluded the amount of tax imposed by this title, whether or not stated as a separate charge. A transportation, delivery, insurance, installation, or other charge (not required by the foregoing sentence to be included) shall be excluded from the price only if the amount thereof is established to the satisfaction of the commissioner, in accordance with the regulations.

(b) If an article is—

(1) sold at retail;

(2) sold on consignment; or

(3) sold (otherwise than through an arm's-length transaction) at less than the fair market price;

the tax under this title shall (if based on the price for which the article is sold) be computed on the price for which such articles are sold, in the ordinary course of trade, by manufacturers or producers thereof, as determined by the commissioner.

(c) In the case of (1) a lease, (2) a contract for the sale of an article wherein it is provided that the price shall be paid by installments and title to the article sold does not pass until a future date notwithstanding partial payment by installments, or (3) a conditional sale, there shall be paid upon each payment with respect to the article that portion of the total tax which is proportionate to the portion of the total amount to be paid represented by such payment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, on page 259, after line 8, to insert:

SEC. 607. SALE OF ARTICLES FOR FURTHER MANUFACTURE

Under regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary, no tax under this title shall be imposed upon any article (other than a tire or inner tube) sold for use as material in the manufacture or production of, or for use as a component part of, an article to be manufactured or produced by the vendee which will be taxable under this title or sold free of tax by virtue of this section. If the vendee resells an article sold to him free of tax under this section, then for the purposes of this title he shall be considered the manufacturer or producer of such article.

Mr. SMOOT. That is intended to prevent pyramiding. I think an amendment to this amendment has been agreed to, to add the words "other than a tire or inner tube."

The VICE PRESIDENT. That has been agreed to.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, on page 259, after line 19, to insert:

SEC. 608. CREDITS AND REFUNDS

(a) A credit against tax under this title, or a refund, may be allowed or made—

(1) To a manufacturer or producer, in the amount of any tax under this title which has been paid with respect to any article purchased by him and used by him as material in the manufacture or production of, or as a component part of, an article with respect to which tax under this title has been paid, or which has been sold free of tax by virtue of section 607, relating to sales of articles for further manufacture.

(2) To any person who has paid tax under this title with respect to an article, when the price on which the tax was based is readjusted by reason of return or repossession of the article or a covering or container, or by a bona fide discount, rebate, or allowance; in the amount of that part of the tax proportionate to the part of the price which is refunded or credited.

(b) Credit or refund under subsection (a) shall be allowed or made only upon compliance with regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary.

(c) In no case shall interest be allowed with respect to any amount of tax under this title credited or refunded.

(d) No overpayment of tax under this title shall be credited or refunded, otherwise than under subsection (a), in pursuance of a court decision or otherwise, unless the person who paid the tax establishes, in accordance with regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary, (1) that he has not included the tax in the price of the article with respect to which it was imposed, or collected the amount of tax from the vendee; or (2) that he has repaid the amount of the tax to the ultimate purchaser of the article, or unless he files with the commissioner written consent of such ultimate purchaser to the allowance of the credit or refund.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 261, after line 5, to insert:

SEC. 609. USE BY MANUFACTURER, PRODUCER, OR IMPORTER

If any person manufactures, produces, or imports an article for his own use (other than use as material, in the manufacture or production of, or as a component part of, another article to be manufactured or produced by him which will be taxable under this title or sold free of tax by virtue of section 607, relating to sale of articles for further manufacture) he shall be liable for tax under this title in the same manner as if such article was sold by him, and the tax shall be computed on the price at which such or similar articles are sold, in the ordinary course of trade, by manufacturers, producers, or importers thereof, as determined by the commissioner.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senate has already agreed to a former amendment that makes it necessary to disagree to this amendment. I ask that the amendment be disagreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BLAINE. It is my desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the committee amendment, on page 247, line 7, was agreed to. A number of amendments were adopted after the action on that amendment. Will it be necessary to move to reconsider all the other amendments which were related to the same subject?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is advised that several of the amendments affect the same subject matter and the motion should be to reconsider all of them.

Mr. BLAINE. Then I enter the motion to reconsider.

Mr. BULKLEY. There are several other amendments involved.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, the whole policy is involved.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be necessary to reconsider all the amendments affecting the same subject.

Mr. BLAINE. Very well; I enter that motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will be entered.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 261, after line 18, to insert:

SEC. 610. SALES BY OTHERS THAN MANUFACTURER, PRODUCER, OR IMPORTER

In case any person other than the manufacturer, producer, or importer of an article acquires, by operation of law or as a result of any transaction not taxable under this title, the right to sell such article, the sale of such article by such person shall be taxable under this title as if made by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, and such person shall be liable for the tax.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 262, line 3, in the title, to strike out "March" and insert "May," so as to read: "Contracts prior to May 1, 1932"; and in line 4 to strike out "March" and insert "May"; and in line 11 to insert "(unless the contract prohibits such addition)."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, on page 262, line 5, I move to strike out the words "with another person" and at the end of line 13 insert a new sentence, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment to the amendment be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 262, line 5, strike out the words "with another person," and at the end of line 13 insert a new sentence as follows:

If a contract of the character above described be made with the United States, no tax shall be collected under this title.

So as to read:

(a) If (1) any person has, prior to May 1, 1932, made a bona fide contract for the sale, after the tax takes effect, of any article in respect of the sale of which a tax is imposed under this title, or in respect of which a tax is imposed under this subsection, and (2) such contract does not permit the adding to the amount to be paid under such contract, of the whole of such tax, then (unless the contract prohibits such addition) the vendee shall, in lieu of the vendor, pay so much of the tax as is not so permitted to be added to the contract price. If a contract of the character above described be made with the United States, no tax shall be collected under this title.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I would like to ask the chairman of the Finance Committee just what are the purpose and object of the provision as stated in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Wherever a contract is made before the passage of the act, of course the tax must be carried to the vendee if the sale is made and there is a tax to be imposed upon it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The point I have in mind is, for instance, in the case of the sale of an automobile. Automobiles are very largely sold on the installment plan, especially the more reasonably priced cars. It is the custom of many of the companies to give the purchaser what is called a sale contract. Under the terms of this sale contract the person does not acquire the title to the automobile. In some States it is held merely as a rental proposition, and before the title passes he has to complete the payments of the installments. The provision here is that on all contracts for a sale made prior to this date, if the vendor does not pay the tax, the vendee shall pay it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think the Senator is laboring under a misapprehension. The provision would not apply the tax to any sales made prior to the passage of the act. The only purpose which the section seeks to accomplish is to provide that where a sale is made after the passage of the act, in case the contract has been entered into prior to the passage of the act, then the tax shall be paid by the vendee. So far as the example which has been cited concerning installment sales is concerned, the bill simply provides that the tax shall be paid only on the basis of those installment payments during the two years in which these various taxes would be in effect.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I understand the Senator's position. What if a person has an installment contract relating to property subject to a tax under the provisions of this bill? Perhaps nine-tenths of the installments will not mature until after the enactment of this bill into law. Does the Senator think it is just and right to require that the vendee or the vendor shall pay a tax on that transaction which was entered into at a time when there was no law imposing a tax?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the title should pass after the law becomes effective, then the vendee would only pay the tax on the installments paid after the passage of the act and after the passage of title to him.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The provisions of section 611 are as follows:

SEC. 611. CONTRACTS PRIOR TO MAY 1, 1932

(a) If (1) any person has, prior to May 1, 1932, made a bona fide contract with another person for the sale, after the tax takes effect, of any article in respect of the sale of which a tax is imposed under this title, or in respect of which a tax is imposed under this subsection, and (2) such contract does not permit the adding to the amount to be paid under such contract, of the whole of such tax, then (unless the contract prohibits such addition) the vendee shall, in lieu of the vendor, pay so much of the tax as is not so permitted to be added to the contract price.

(b) The taxes payable by the vendee shall be paid to the vendor at the time the sale is consummated, and shall be collected, returned, and paid to the United States by such vendor in the same manner as provided in section 702. In case of failure or refusal by the vendee to pay such taxes to the vendor, the vendor shall report the facts to the commissioner, who shall cause collection of such taxes to be made from the vendee.

That is certainly not very clear; but, on the other hand, I think in all probability under that language it would affect all installment propositions that have been entered into at any time prior to this date where the purchaser is purchasing under a sales contract which is not completed and the title has not been delivered until the last installment is paid. That is a matter of great injustice to the people of the country who buy on the installment plan. We know as a rule that people who buy that way do it as a matter of necessity. No one of particular means will buy on the installment plan. Take the case of a person a year ago who was unable to pay cash for an automobile, but bought it under a sales contract. That transaction is not completed until after this law becomes operative. It is the proposal of the committee to make it retroactive upon him and require him to pay a tax. Suppose at the same time some other person bought an automobile and paid cash for it, then he does not have to pay a penny of tax.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the purchaser of the automobile got title to it under his contract after the passage of this act, he would only pay a tax on the installments paid after title was passed to him. Unless some such provision as this is put into the law, all anyone would have to do in order to avoid the tax would be simply to make a contract prior to the time it went into effect and he would have no tax to pay. It is perfectly just and fair, it seems to me, to ask for the payment of a tax upon the portion of the contract not concluded until after the title passes subsequent to the enactment of this tax.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think that is a great discrimination against the poor, unfortunate person who has bought an automobile on the installment plan instead of paying cash for it. If the man with cash wants to defeat the law, he can go out and buy an automobile and pay cash for it; but if he buys it on the installment plan, he must pay the tax. What are we going to do about the person who is able to pay cash? Can he, in spite of the law, avoid the tax? But the Senator wants to restrict and circumscribe the person who is unable to pay cash and say, forsooth, because he plans to buy an automobile within this time, and pay for it by installments, that a tax is to be imposed upon him because of his inability to pay.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There is nothing retroactive about it. He only pays a tax on the installments which it is necessary for him to pay in order to secure title to the automobile after the law goes into effect.

Mr. TRAMMELL. It is retroactive in that it changes the terms and conditions of his contract of purchase. He considered that he had bought under certain conditions. He bought the article at a given price. He has that contract in course of operation, but he is to be told, "Now we are going to come in and make you pay more for that automobile which you had delivered to you under your sales contract 6 or 12 months ago."

On the other hand, if some person, 6 or 8 or 10 months ago, had the ability to pay cash for a similar automobile, he does not have to pay any tax. If he has the ability to pay cash for it six days before the law becomes operative, he would not have to pay any tax. But the unfortunate poor man has a tax imposed on him in the transaction, a transaction which was entered into prior to the enactment of the law.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me invite the attention of the Senator to the fact that this is not a retail tax. It is a manufacturers' tax which the manufacturer of the automobile pays. In the case the Senator talks about, in which the dealer has already gotten title to the car, but before the law goes into effect sells it to the ultimate consumer, he would not pay any tax.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is what I desire to have done. I want the provision clarified. It seems to me the article purchased is followed into the hands of the consumer and a tax is imposed upon him.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, no. Under this provision the manufacturer pays the tax. If the title has passed to the retail dealer before the law goes into effect and he owns the car and sells on the installment plan to the consumer, there is no tax paid. In the case the Senator suggests he is not taxed at all. That has been the law for years.

Mr. SMOOT. This is a manufacturers' tax.

Mr. CONNALLY. This is a manufacturers' tax. The retailer has nothing in the world to do with this tax; a retail purchaser has nothing to do with it. This tax is paid by the manufacturer of the car.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is the point I desire to have made perfectly clear. Under certain definitions in this particular section the idea would be conveyed that the tax would follow the article even into the hands of the purchaser who may have purchased for his own use.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me ask the Senator a question. If a man buys an automobile before this proposed law goes into effect and pays cash for it, he would not be taxed, would he?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly, he would not be.

Mr. CONNALLY. Very well. If he buys it on installments he will not be taxed, because he buys it from a retailer who has already acquired title to the car, and it is immaterial whether he sells it for cash or sells it on installments; he is selling something that he then owned and which he had acquired from a manufacturer before the tax went into effect.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think, under the provisions in question, even if it does not apply to the actual user of the automobile, it could very easily work an injustice upon the retail dealer, because if the vendor, the manufacturer, has not paid the tax, then it could be required that on past transactions the vendee should do so, even if it is restricted to dealers. Of course, I want it restricted to dealers; I do not want it to apply to the individual purchaser.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I call the Senator's attention to section 605, on page 257, which reads:

For the purposes of this title, the lease of an article shall be considered the sale of such article.

I am wondering if that meets the Senator's objection?

Mr. TRAMMELL. To what section does the Senator refer?

Mr. HASTINGS. Section 605 on page 257, which furnishes a definition of sale. It reads:

For the purposes of this title, the lease of an article shall be considered the sale of such article.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I notice that definition, but I would have to construe that in connection with the other paragraph.

I give notice now of a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment in this section was adopted, and I now enter the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will be entered. The next amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 262, in line 5, the Senator from Utah proposes to strike out the words "with another person," and at the end of line 13 insert a new sentence to read as follows:

If a contract of the character above described was made with the United States no tax shall be collected under this title.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next committee amendment will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 262, line 3, after the word "to," to strike out "March" and insert "May," so as to make the heading read:

Contracts prior to May 1, 1932.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 611, on page 262, line 4, after the words "prior to," to strike out "March" and insert "May."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 262, line 11, after the word "then," to insert "(unless the contract prohibits such addition)."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 262, line 17, after the figures "702," to insert "In case of failure or refusal by the vendee to pay such taxes to the vendor, the vendor shall report the facts to the commissioner, who shall cause collection of such taxes to be made from the vendee," so as to read:

(b) The taxes payable by the vendee shall be paid to the vendor at the time the sale is consummated, and shall be collected, returned, and paid to the United States by such vendor in the same manner as provided in section 702. In case of failure or refusal by the vendee to pay such taxes to the vendor, the vendor shall report the facts to the commissioner, who shall cause collection of such taxes to be made from the vendee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 262, line 25, after the word "him," to strike out "(except tax under section 615, relating to tax on soft drinks)," so as to read:

SEC. 612. RETURN AND PAYMENT OF MANUFACTURERS' TAXES

(a) Every person liable for any tax imposed by this title on sales by him shall make monthly returns under oath in duplicate and pay the taxes imposed by this title to the collector for the district in which is located his principal place of business or, if he has no principal place of business in the United States, then to the collector at Baltimore, Md. Such returns shall contain such information and be made at such times and in such manner as the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may by regulations prescribe.

Mr. SMOOT. On page 262, line 25, I move to strike out the words "on sales by him" and insert the words "(other than taxes on importation)." It is merely a clarifying amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Have we disagreed to the committee amendment on line 25, page 262?

Mr. SMOOT. Not as yet.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That amendment has not yet been acted upon. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is agreeing to the committee amendment on page 262, line 25, which will again be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 262, line 25, after the word "him," it is proposed to strike out "(except tax under section 615, relating to tax on soft drinks)."

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that that amendment be disagreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, on page 264, line 1, after the word "title," to insert:

In so far as it relates to the taxes on articles sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer. The Secretary shall prescribe and publish all needful rules and regulations for the enforcement of this title in so far as it relates to the taxes which under the provisions of section 601(b) are to be levied, assessed, collected, and paid in the same manner as duties imposed by the tariff act of 1930.

So as to read:

SEC. 614. RULES AND REGULATIONS

The commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, shall prescribe and publish all needful rules and regulations for the enforcement of this title in so far as it relates to the taxes on articles sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer. The Secretary shall prescribe and publish all needful rules and regulations for the enforcement of this title in so far as it relates to the taxes which under the provisions of section 601(b) are to be levied, assessed, collected, and paid in the same manner as duties imposed by the tariff act of 1930.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 264, line 11, after the word "section," to strike out "622" and insert "614," and in line 14, after the figures "1934," to insert "(or after July 31, 1934, in the case of articles taxable under sec. 602, relating to the tax on automobiles, etc.)," so as to read:

SEC. 615. EFFECTIVE DATE

This title shall take effect on the fifteenth day after the date of the enactment of this act, except that section 614, relating to rules and regulations, and this section, shall take effect on the date of the enactment of this act. No sale or importation after June 30, 1934 (or after July 31, 1934, in the case of articles taxable under sec. 602, relating to the tax on automobiles, etc.), shall be taxable under this title.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Title V.—Miscellaneous taxes. Part I.—Tax on telegraph, telephone, radio, and cable facilities," on page 265, line 2, after the name "United States," to strike out "and for the transmission of which the charge is more than 30 cents and less than 50 cents, a tax of 5 cents; and if the charge is 50 cents or more, a tax of 10 cents," and insert:

A tax at the following rates:

(A) Telephone conversations for which the charge is 50 cents or more and less than $1, 10 cents; for which the charge is $1 or more and less than $2, 15 cents; for which the charge is $2 or more, 20 cents;

(B) telegraph dispatches and messages, 5 per cent of the amount charged therefor; and

(C) cable and radio dispatches and messages, 10 cents.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 265, line 20, after the word "to," to strike out "10 per cent" and insert "5 per cent," so as to read:

(2) A tax equivalent to 5 per cent of the amount paid on or after the fifteenth day after the date of the enactment of this act to any telegraph or telephone company for any leased-wire or talking-circuit special service furnished on or after such date and before July 1, 1934.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, before this section is passed I should like to inquire of the Senator from Utah, if the language proposed to be stricken out by the Finance Committee on subsection (b) on page 266 shall be restored, will it exempt newspapers from a tax on their leased-wire service?

Mr. SMOOT. No; this amendment subjects them to the tax.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I asked if the House language was left in would that exempt them?

Mr. SMOOT. The House language would exempt them, I will say to the Senator, but the Senate amendment does not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. So that question may be raised without offering any further amendment?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the House language taxes them 10 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. I said it subjected them to a tax, but I did not state the amount.

Mr. HARRISON. The exemption is on page 266, paragraph (b). It would have nothing to do with this. If the other provision is stricken out, then we would recur to that.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I wanted to ascertain whether the House language exempts newspapers. If not, then it will be necessary to offer an amendment before we pass the section under consideration.

Mr. HARRISON. The House language in paragraph (b), on the next page, does exempt newspapers on their leased-wire service. So it becomes a question of whether or not the Senate will agree to it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I wanted to get the construction of the committee on that question, because I was in some doubt about its construction.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I inquire what is now before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment in line 20, on page 265, striking out 10 per cent and inserting 5 per cent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 701, page 266, line 3, after the word "company," to strike out the words "or roadiobroadcasting station or network."

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to the result which will accrue if the amendment shall be adopted proposing to strike out this language on page 266.

I take it that the viewpoint of the Finance Committee was that radiobroadcasting is an advertising business and that those engaged in it should pay their share of the tax on line charges along with any other business. I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that most of the line charges for radiobroadcasting and network—I say most of them; more than 50 per cent of those charges—are for what are known as sponsored programs, which are noncommercial. Every program that is put out from a radio station other than from the studio will be taxed under this provision. That means that all the programs that are not paid for by advertisers will be taxed, and to that extent the public will receive less and less of such service and fewer of such programs.

I have had prepared for me by the officials of the National Association of Broadcasters the figures on this subject, and they are really quite striking. Three-fifths of the money paid for line charges—that is, the use of telephone lines—is for noncommercial programs. They bring no revenue to the station at all. For 186 broadcasting stations—not the networks, not the chain programs—it is shown that in 1921 the average amount spent by each station for leased telephone lines was $4,368. Of that sum $2,607, or 60 per cent, was for noncommercial uses.

The point I am trying to make is this: Every radio station makes its money out of advertising programs. It then takes a certain part of the money received for advertising and uses it to pay for the operation of its station and the charges for telephone lines to put on free programs. Those programs may be church services; they may be reports of baseball games; they may be addresses at banquets; they may be speeches of noted public men or personages, pleas for community-chest work, and almost innumerable kinds of addresses. If we apply this 5 per cent tax to noncommercial programs, we will to that extent diminish the amount of such service to the public. Certainly we do not want to do anything to give the radio stations an excuse for putting any more advertising on the air than they now do.

When we come to the network, the Columbia and the National Broadcasting Cos., we find that from 60 to 70 per cent of the line charges for connecting the stations across the United States are charges for carrying programs that are noncommercial. All of the addresses that we hear over the networks—not advertising—from those of the President down to those of the most ordinary public character are carried as a contribution to the public by the radiobroadcasting chain. The figures show that last year the two big chains, the Columbia and the National Broadcasting Cos., spent $4,724,560, and of this amount $3,229,000, or 68 per cent, was for line charges for carrying noncommercial programs—programs that were not advertising. Take a 5 per cent tax out of that $3,600,000 and we will take from the public to the extent of about $180,000 the programs that are noncommercial.

It seems to me that this provision should be amended so that the charges to broadcasting stations for the wires used in noncommercial programs shall be exempt.

I should like to offer an amendment proposing that the House language be retained, with the words added, after the word "work," on line 4, page 266, "when used for noncommercial broadcasting," so that it would read:

> This paragraph shall not apply to the amount paid for so much of such service as is utilized in the conduct by a common carrier or telephone or telegraph company or radiobroadcasting station or network when used for noncommercial broadcasting.

As nearly as I can figure, the adoption of this amendment would mean a loss in revenue of something around two hundred thousand or possibly two hundred and fifty thousand dollars. It is for the Senate to decide whether it wants to take that money out of the treasuries of radio stations and put it in the Treasury of the United States as a tax, and thereby deprive the public of that much free entertainment without any advertising, or whether it will keep the tax on the noncommercial as well as the commercial broadcasting charges.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I desire to emphasize what the Senator from Washington has said. As Senators know, I have done a good deal of broadcasting; and when it has been over a commercially sponsored station, the wire charge has been paid by the advertiser.

As the Senator has so well said, if this tax is placed on leased wires it will mean that the broadcasting stations will be forced to discontinue a great deal of their entertainment features and take on more commercial advertising, which, to my mind, would be a distressing thing.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I want to add just one thing. I omitted to say that nearly all of the educational programs in this country are put on the air by the big networks and the big stations without charge, and this will necessarily diminish the number of those.

Mr. COPELAND. That will be true of all the sustaining features; and, to my mind, the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington is one which should be accepted by the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from Washington will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 266, line 4, after the word "work" and the comma, it is proposed to insert "when used for noncommercial broadcasting."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the committee amendment has not been rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That can be dealt with after this amendment is voted upon.

Mr. DILL. This is the same procedure that was followed this morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If this amendment is agreed to, the committee amendment should be rejected.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Washington if there is any controversy as to what is noncommercial.

Mr. DILL. I do not think there could be any doubt about it.

Mr. KING. Is the terminology understood and recognized in the trade and in the business?

Mr. DILL. Unquestionably.

Mr. COPELAND. Thoroughly.

Mr. DILL. It would merely mean that those programs which were paid for by advertising would pay the tax on line charges between the radiobroadcasting station and the place from which the program was sent, and that those which were not paid for by advertising, which were paid for by the station itself, as a public contribution of radio service, would not pay the charge.

Mr. KING. If political parties, for instance, or a political speaker, desired to disseminate their or his political views, what would happen?

Mr. DILL. If the political speaker paid for the time he used, and there was a wire charge for sending his address from the place where he talked to the station, or if it was a hook-up of stations, the tax would be collected; but if it were a political speech by a President or a Senator or a Congressman that is sent out in these public-forum programs, for which no charge is made to anybody, but which are paid for by the station, it would not apply.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Washington is very familiar with this subject; and I should like to ask him whether any of these broadcasting organizations or companies, local or national, have been furnishing to their political friends, especially to our Republican friends, the use of their facilities without charge.

Mr. DILL. Oh, yes; they do—I think not only to the Republican friends but to the Democratic friends.

I want to say, in a spirit of fairness to the big broadcasting chains, that they are eminently fair in their giving of opportunities to both parties. Of course the fact that the Republicans have charge of the Government, that they have the President, that they have the Cabinet, necessarily causes the chains to give more opportunities to Republican public men, probably in a general way, than to Democrats, but that is not due to the fact that they are Republicans—it is due to the fact that there are more of them holding these high positions. Very naturally Cabinet officers are allowed to talk over these chains, because of the fact that they have things to say of great public interest. Sometimes, probably, they take advantage of it and make political speeches, but I doubt if the Democrats would do any differently if they were in power.

Mr. KING. I have been led to believe, from reports which have come to me, that too often the broadcasting services have been, I will not say prostituted, but employed very largely by political organizations that had abundance of money to pay for them.

Mr. DILL. I remind the Senator that in 1928 neither party could complain of unequal or unfair treatment. I think the candidates of the two parties and their supporters were given as nearly equal treatment as could possibly have been given. I think the broadcasting companies did that, first, because they wanted to be fair, and, second, as a matter of self-defense. They do not dare take sides in a great campaign of that kind.

I want to say to the Senator that I do not defend these companies for many things they do; but I must say that my observation leads me to believe that the great chains are fair in a political fight of this kind.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL].

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, does not the Senator think there is just as much equity and justice in making this exemption of broadcasts purely for entertainment as there is for exempting newspapers for transmitting press dispatches? It is equally meritorious.

Mr. DILL. Of course, the newspapers are in the business of making money out of their dispatches.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly.

Mr. DILL. And the radio programs that are making money would be required to pay this tax.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Under the House provision the newspapers will not be required to pay a tax upon their press dispatches. They will be exempt.

Mr. DILL. Yes; that is true. They would be.

Mr. TRAMMELL. If that is true, and is a proper policy, I think there is ample reason to justify exempting the entertainment that may be broadcast not for commercial purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I can not see any reason why this amendment should be offered. I think these broadcasting companies ought to be treated just the same as telegraph and telephone companies.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I know the Senator from New York perhaps thinks otherwise; but does the Senator really feel that they ought to be taken out of this bill entirely, and no tax whatever placed upon them, when we include the telephone and telegraph companies?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am sorry the Senator feels that way.

Mr. SMOOT. The committee felt that way. It was unanimous.

Mr. COPELAND. This noncommercial use of the leased wires of the radio is employed to broadcast sermons, dedications of fine churches in Washington and other cities, music, and many entertaining features which are of interest to the people of our country. To put a tax upon the wires under those circumstances is to lessen the amount of instruction and education and spiritual advancement that the people would get and are getting through the present use of the wires.

Mr. SMOOT. I will leave the question to the Senate to decide.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I may state in this connection that more or less of the broadcasting stations in the country are maintained at government expense, or largely so maintained. I know that within my State a few of the broadcasting stations have been provided by the municipalities; and while, of course, they utilize them to try to recover some of the expenditures which they have to undergo, a considerable part of the broadcasting is purely for entertainment purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will look at the next paragraph, he will find that the United States, States, or Territories or political subdivisions thereof and the District of Columbia are taken care of there.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL]. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Several Senators called for a division.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. May the amendment be stated?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be restated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 266, line 4, after the word "work," the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] proposes to insert the words "when used for noncommercial broadcasting."

Mr. DILL. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. DILL. I make the point of no quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Copeland	Hull	Robinson, Ark.
Bailey	Costigan	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.
Bankhead	Couzens	Jones	Schall
Barbour	Davis	Kean	Sheppard
Barkley	Dickinson	Kendrick	Shipstead
Bingham	Dill	Keyes	Smoot
Blaine	Fletcher	King	Stephens
Borah	Fess	La Follette	Thomas, Idaho
Bratton	Frazier	Lewis	Thomas, Okla.
Broussard	George	Logan	Townsend
Bulkley	Gore	McGill	Trammell
Bulow	Hale	McNary	Tydings
Byrnes	Harrison	Metcalf	Vandenberg
Capper	Hastings	Moses	Wagner
Caraway	Hatfield	Norris	Walsh, Mass.
Carey	Hawes	Nye	Walsh, Mont.
Cohen	Hayden	Oddie	Watson
Connally	Hebert	Pittman	Wheeler
Coolidge	Howell	Reed	White

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-six Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I did not quite understand what the Senator's amendment was. Will he not repeat it?

Mr. DILL. My amendment proposes, in line 4, page 266, that the House text be not stricken out. I want to amend the House text and insert, after the word "work," in line 4, the words "when used for noncommercial broadcasting," so that the exception would read, "or radio broadcasting station or network when used for noncommercial broadcasting."

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know just what the effect would be from a revenue standpoint, but why not let it go to conference?

Mr. DILL. The effect would be to take this wire charge off programs which are not advertising programs. If the Senator will accept it and let it go to conference, I think that will be agreeable.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator from Washington whether under the provision, with his amendment added, a broadcasting station owned and operated by an educational institution, such as an agricultural and mechanical college—and I have a specific instance in mind—would be subject to the tax?

Mr. DILL. If the college is a State or municipal institution, no tax could be collected on anything it might broadcast by the use of a wire; but if it were not a State institution, it would have to pay the tax, the same as any other commercial station.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the purpose of the amendment of the Senator from Washington is to cover, among other things, the very matters the Senator from New Mexico has in mind. If this were a noncommercial broadcast, an educational program of a college, if this amendment were adopted there would be no tax on the use of the wire for that purpose.

Mr. BRATTON. So that any educational institution not engaged in commercial broadcasting would be exempted under the provision as a whole?

Mr. DILL. With this amendment added.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, on page 266, line 8, after the name "District of Columbia," to strike out the comma and "nor upon any payment received from any person for services or facilities utilized in the collection of news for the public press or in the dissemination of news through the public press, if the charge for such services or facilities is billed in writing to such person," so as to read:

(b) No tax shall be imposed under this section upon any payment received for services or facilities furnished to the United States or to any State or Territory, or political subdivision thereof, or the District of Columbia. The right to exemption under this subsection shall be evidenced in such manner as the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary may by regulation prescribe.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, this amendment involves a subject of very grave public importance. It is proposed by the committee to strike from this section language incorporated by the House which exempts from the tax a leased wire for the dissemination of news through the press. Without expressing any positive opinion upon the subject, I submit to the lawyers of this body that there is involved in this proposition a grave new constitutional question.

Here is involved a tax upon the dissemination of information through the public press. We are all familiar with the provision in the first amendment to the Constitution that Congress shall pass no law abridging the freedom of the press. Of course, the first consideration is, What is included within the term "freedom"?

I submit that that is not limited merely to the expression of views through the editorial columns of newspapers, nor is it limited to the character of the news which a newspaper is authorized to print. Necessarily involved in the question is the right, without abridgment, without limitation, without taxation, to gather the news, to secure the information, and then to disseminate it through the columns of the papers. If a tax may be imposed upon the collection and dissemination of news, I submit that that tax may be so increased as to make it impossible for newspapers to operate.

This does not involve a general tax, to which all business and all property would be subject, but a special tax limited to a special purpose, and that purpose is the collection and dissemination of news through the press.

It may be compared to the subject of the right of Congress to abridge the freedom of speech. Both inhibitions are contained in the same amendment to the Constitution. I am sure that it will be admitted that a tax to make a speech would not be permissible under this provision of the Constitution, because that would be an abridgment of the right of freedom of speech. For just as strong reasons I submit that a tax which may limit the dissemination of information through the public press falls under this inhibition in the Constitution.

Aside from that, Mr. President, there are other considerations why this provision incorporated by the House should be retained in this bill. I make no appeal for the large metropolitan press of this country, but I do assert that, as most members of this body must recognize, the newspapers in the average-sized cities and the smaller towns throughout this country are confronted with the same problem that confronts every other business in this country.

We know that the life of the newspaper is based upon its advertisers. We know that the volume of the advertising is based upon the purchasing power of the public, and with the purchasing power of the public gone, advertisements are disappearing, subscribers are less able to pay their subscriptions than in former days, and I submit that there is no reason for placing a burden upon this great agency of public information and education.

If this tax is imposed, there can be but one of two results. One is that it must bear upon the treasuries of the newspapers, which are not now able to bear this additional burden. Otherwise it must result in the abbreviation of news, it must result in the discharge of many special correspondents here and there, because the newspapers are obliged to balance their budgets, which is as important for them as it is for Congress to balance the Federal Budget.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not know how much revenue would be involved in this, but I would be willing to have a vote on it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Very well. Those who are opposed to it will vote "no."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I call to the attention of the Senator from Utah the fact that in line 9 the word "person" is used. I assume that would include corporations?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. That is, there would be no charge made to a person or corporation under these circumstances?

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, on page 267, line 6, after the word "prescribe," to insert "The commissioner may extend the time for making returns and paying the taxes collected, under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe, with the approval of the Secretary, but no such extension shall be for more than 90 days," so as to read:

SEC. 702. RETURNS AND PAYMENT OF TAX

(a) The taxes imposed by section 701 shall be paid by the person paying for the services or facilities.

(b) Each person receiving any payments specified in section 701 shall collect the amount of the tax imposed by such section from the person making such payments, and shall on or before the last day of each month make a return, under oath, for the preceding month, and pay the taxes so collected, to the collector of the district in which his principal place of business is located, or if he has no principal place of business in the United States, to the collector at Baltimore, Md. Such returns shall contain such information and be made in such manner as the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may by regulation prescribe. The commissioner may extend the time for making returns and paying the taxes collected, under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe, with the approval of the Secretary, but no such extension shall be for more than 90 days.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I voted in favor of retaining the provision to exempt press lines from a tax, and I think that is very proper; but I do not want it understood that I agree with the suggestion made by the Senator from Alabama that it would be in violation of the constitutional provision affecting the freedom of the press. As a matter of fact, I do not think that would have any bearing upon the question. The press enjoys freedom under the Constitution, but it should not enjoy immunity under the Constitution from impositions of taxation which may be applied to other citizens. I think those are two entirely different questions, although I voted for exempting the press from this provision.

The next amendment was, on page 267, after line 10, to strike out:

(c) The tax shall, without assessment by the commissioner or notice from the collector, be due and payable to the collector at the time fixed for filing the return. If the tax is not paid when due, there shall be added as part of the tax interest at the rate of 1 per cent a month from the time the tax became due until paid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 267, after line 16, to strike out:

(d) The provisions (including penalties) of section 1114 of the revenue act of 1926 shall be applicable with respect to the tax imposed by section 701.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 267, after line 19, to strike out:

SEC. 703. REFUNDS AND CREDITS

(a) No credit or refund of any tax imposed by section 701 shall be made unless the person who paid the tax to the United States shall establish, to the satisfaction of the commissioner, under such regulations as the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary may prescribe, that he has repaid the amount of such tax to the person from whom he collected it, or obtained the consent of such person to the allowance of such credit or refund.

(b) Any person entitled to refund of tax under section 701 paid by him to the United States may take credit therefor against taxes due upon any monthly return.

(c) Any person making a refund of any payment on which tax under section 701 has been collected, may repay therewith the amount of tax collected on such payment, and the amount of tax so repaid may be credited against the tax under any subsequent return under section 702.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 268, after line 11, to strike out:

SEC. 704. REGULATIONS

The commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, shall prescribe and publish all needful rules and regulations for the enforcement of this part.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah has an amendment to section 711.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. The committee met this morning and decided to offer an amendment to section 711.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In lieu of the amendment proposed by the committee in the printed text of the bill, the committee proposes the following amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 269, line 1, and again in lines 13 and 14, and again in line 1, on page 271, strike out "11 cents" and insert in lieu thereof "31 cents."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. May the Chair suggest to the Senator that that leaves the amendment in lines 21 and 22, on page 268.

Mr. SMOOT. We want to disagree to that.

Mr. COUZENS. The committee agreed to ask that the Senate disagree to the amendment in lines 21 and 22.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The purpose of the Chair is to proceed in an orderly way and in sequence, and therefore the Chair propounded the question to the Senator from Utah. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in lines 21 and 22, on page 268, to which the committee wishes to disagree, and which will be stated.

The amendment was, under the subhead "Part II—Admissions Tax," on page 268, line 21, after the word "thereof," to insert "(or, in the case of admission to a horse or dog race, 25 per cent)," so as to read:

SEC. 711. ADMISSIONS TAX

(a) Paragraph (1) of section 500 (a) of the revenue act of 1926, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(1) A tax of 1 cent for each 10 cents or fraction thereof (or, in the case of admission to a horse or dog race, 25 per cent) of the amount paid for admission to any place, including admission by season ticket or subscription, to be paid by the person paying for such admission;

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, are we proposing to put a tax upon horse or dog races?

Mr. COUZENS. That is to be taken out because it is higher than the other admissions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment in lines 21 and 22, page 268.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from Utah will be again stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Utah proposes, under "Admissions tax," on page 269, line 1, and again in lines 13 and 14, and on page 271, line 1, to strike out "11 cents" and insert in lieu thereof "31 cents."

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I move to amend by striking out "31 cents" and inserting in lieu thereof "41 cents." As I understand it, the committee this morning changed the rate of amusement taxes and has increased the exemption from 11 cents to 31 cents. I am moving to make it 41 cents instead of 31 cents.

I want to congratulate the Committee on Finance upon receding from the position of taxing 10-cent shows 10 per cent. I am endeavoring to increase to 41 cents what they have done by making it 31 cents.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, is a substitute in order for the Senator's amendment? I want to raise it to 51 cents.

Mr. JOHNSON. May I suggest to the Senator from Maryland that instead of that I would prefer to leave it as the House fixed it, but I am proposing to fix it at 41 cents because I thought that with the committee action increasing it to 31 cents, there could be no logical objection to making it 41 cents and then permitting the House and the Senate in conference to determine as between 41 and 46 cents. I would prefer what the amendment of the Senator from Maryland suggests, or taking the House rate. I was endeavoring to do that which I thought would be easy of accomplishment.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I feel that this industry is perhaps in as bad straits as any other industry in the country. I see no reason for picking out this one industry and "soaking" it with this terrificly high tax simply because a lot of poor people congregate in its places of entertainment. So far as I am concerned I would like to strike it all out.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, for the RECORD I would like to have the Senator from Utah state what revenue will come to the public treasury from the original committee amendment, what revenue will come from the modified committee amendment of 31 cents exemption, and what revenue will come from the proposal now made by the Senator from California of 41 cents.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the 11-cent exemption the revenue would be $110,000,000. Under the 31-cent exemption there would be $57,000,000.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is the committee proposal?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes. In other words, there would be a reduction from $110,000,000 down to $57,000,000, or $53,000,000.

Mr. JOHNSON. Can the Senator tell us the amount that would be realized under a 41-cent exemption?

Mr. GORE. I think it would be $17,000,000 less.

Mr. SMOOT. One estimate sent to the committee was $44,000,000 and another estimate was $46,000,000.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator state what revenue will be received under the House provision?

Mr. SMOOT. It is estimated at $40,000,000.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I earnestly wish to assist in balancing the Budget and am sorry to disagree with the committee on this item. I have gone along with the committee on practically everything, but I invite attention to the deplorable fact that the spoken drama in the United States is now almost extinguished. I do not believe we have reached such a deplorable place in our history that we would be willing unfairly to tax or to penalize the spoken drama or the talkie movie.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I hold in my hand an amendment which I propose to offer to exempt the spoken drama from the imposition of this tax. As soon as the pending amendment is disposed of I shall offer it.

Mr. ASHURST. I am glad to hear that. Mr. President, I am opposed to admission taxes, whether for the spoken drama or the talkie movies. Such taxes are only an irritant—they are like unto a dash of tabasco sauce in the eye and will be deeply resented by the American people. Some well-informed persons argue that the theaters and talkie movies are luxuries and amusements only. That they are, from one angle, "amusements" is quite true; that they possess facilities for disseminating interesting information of much practical value, especially to those persons who can not spare the time or money to travel, is none the less true.

It is also true that the theaters and the talkie movies make contributions to art, belles-lettres literature, music, science, and philosophy, and appeal to and help to gratify that inborn cultural and artistic yearning inherent in every normal person, although in some breasts this yearning is meager and obscure, and sometimes is deeply hidden.

Robert Burns, during a flash of his shining genius, wrote, in his address to the Unco Guid, or in his address to a Louse, I do not for the moment remember which, "Oh, wad some power the giftie gie us to see oursel's as others see us."

The stage artists, the screen artists, and the vaudeville artists hold the mirror up to nature and only through them do we ever see ourselves as others see us.

On the stage and on the screen we see our own weaknesses, foibles, and pretensions made plain and then corrected. On the stage and on the screen the richness of human experience is laid before us, and all that is beautiful, all that is tragic, and all that is mournful in man's destiny are clearly shown.

The penetrating skill, the Attic salt, and the humor of the screen artist and the stage artist expose the shams and frivolities of a particular epoch and not infrequently teach a nation the way of truth.

The plays of Æschylus and of Euripides taught the Greeks to meet disaster becomingly and to realize that, although Fate spins a strange pattern and motif into every career, such circumstance affords no reason for a refusal to meet life courageously and cheerfully.

The comedies of Shakespeare enriched England, softened the cruelties of his time, and gave seasonable advice and admonition to monarch, to lords, and commons. There would have been no polished Elizabethan England except for Shakespeare, who appeared personally in some of his own plays, notably his Twelfth Night, which he acted in 1602, and from the stage poured gentle satire upon vanity and injustice.

I do not doubt that Schiller and Goethe helped Germany, and I am certain that Molière and Rostand and Bernhardt enriched France. Who can measure the joy and the emotional sympathy that Dion Boucicault gave to the world? He was called the scribe of the American and English stage and had 124 dramas to his credit.

Unnumbered thousands of our own generation have been charmed by the melodious airs and clever rhymes of the Gilbert and Sullivan light operas and the talent of those two gentlemen was so exceptional and their criticisms of official smugness and complacency were so deft and subtle that their productions were given audition and applause by the most prim and rigid of the Mid-Victorians.

It would be impossible to estimate the ennobling influence showered upon our Nation by such characters as Edwin Booth and David Belasco.

Amidst the gloom of the depression and out of the darkness of the country's financial and industrial misfortune, there suddenly beamed forth, last winter, when the clouds were lowering, five stars, five distinguished Thespians to tour our country: The superb Maude Adams and the well-beloved Otis Skinner revived the Merchant of Venice; William Gillette came back to us in Sherlock Holmes; Ethel Barrymore reproduced Sheridan's School for Scandal; and Walter Hampden gave us again glorious Cyrano de Bergerac, the fascinating yet futile lover, poet, duelist, and hero of seventeenth century France. How many weary hours these artists beguiled; how many desolate hearts they encouraged; how many of our citizens learned anew from them that moderation, forbearance, and restraint are the virtues of victory and prosperity and that fortitude, patience, and courage are the virtues of disaster and defeat.

The drama is coextensive with the people and of all the arts, save music, it is probably the dearest to the human race. The stage is akin to poetry in that it is a great expression of human emotion. The stage is a vision of the romance inseparable from every human life; it is a magical place, breathing the inspiration of color and sound; a place for high thoughts, splendid truths, and beautiful words, for objects vividly observed and gorgeously imagined.

The stage is art. Art is truth, and in the final sum of worldly things, only art endures; the sculptures outlast the dynasty, the colors outlive DaVinci, "the coin outlasts Tiberius."

When Hamlet, Prince of Denmark, desired a rehearsal of the play which was to confound his uncle the king he said to the players: "Come, give us a taste of your quality." After the players had recited, Hamlet turned to Polonius, the lord chamberlain, and said:

> My lord, will you see the players well bestowed? Do you hear, let them be well used, for they are the abstracts and brief chronicles of the time; after your death you were better have a bad epitaph than their ill report while you lived.

So, Mr. President, when our citizens, after a day devoted to the duties and claims of this fevered life, go to the theater or to the talkie movies, there to renew their exhausted strength, there mayhap to escape for an hour from the specter of their baffled hopes, from their broken ideals or evaporated illusions, so common in this complex machine age, or there to be spared for an evening from the fardels and the clangor of a bewildered world, let them not be met with a Federal admission tax, which, as I said before, is a vexatious, corrosive, pestiferous irritant.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE obtained the floor.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, does not the Senator from California think it might be well to vote before the effect of the beautiful and oratorical address of the Senator from Arizona has lost its influence?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I quite agree with the Senator, but I should like also to pay tribute to the address to which we have just listened. It does credit to one who already has a splendid reputation for learning and for oratory in its nobler phases.

Mr. President, I propose delaying the Senate but for a moment. I wish merely to observe that the House Ways and Means Committee gave to the subject very careful and thoughtful consideration and reported in favor of exempting from this proposed tax admissions up to 46 cents. The Committee on Finance has now suggested an amendment to the bill as it came to us fixing the exemption on admissions at 31 cents. My colleague has made a motion that the exemption be fixed at 41 cents. I very heartily concur that that should be the action of the Senate.

I merely wish to add that I have made every effort not only to uphold the action of the House but, indeed, I went somewhat further and urged the committee to fix the exemption of admissions at 51 cents.

I can add nothing to what has been said by my colleague; certainly I would not presume to add anything to the masterly remarks of the Senator from Arizona. I am hopeful, therefore, that, without further delaying the matter, the Senate will agree to the proposed amendment offered by my colleague and fix the exemption at 41 cents, and I express the hope that the Senate conferees will not stand adamant but will yield to the views of the House, so that admission tickets sold for less than 46 cents shall be exempted from paying a tax.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, only a few minutes ago in effect we paid the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] $1,000,000 to stop speaking. I do not think we ought to pay the Senator from Arizona more than $44,000,000 for the speech he has just made, although it might well be worth the money.

The senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has suggested an exemption from the tax on admissions up to 41 cents. That will still raise some forty-five or forty-six million dollars as against $110,000,000 which would be realized if the committee amendment were adopted.

It seems to me that we might well compromise on that figure, as I have been assured by some who represent the industry and who are in a position to know—whose judgment I respect—that the industry can stand a tax if admission charges up to 40 cents are exempted from it. Under the committee's amendment the exemption stops at 31 cents. I have made it a rule to stand by the committee, but in this instance I feel constrained to support the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. His amendment raises the exemption from 31 to 41 cents. This may mean the difference between life and death.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, before the vote is taken upon this question, and in view of the fact that I have generally sustained the committee, allow me to say that in the committee I reserved the right to vote for such an amendment as that offered by the Senator from California, and I shall so vote in this instance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California.

Mr. KING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER], the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER], and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] are in attendance upon a meeting of the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. McNARY. I desire to announce the necessary absence of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] in the meeting of the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-two Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I offer a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. In place of the figures "41" I move to insert the figures "46."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. A point of order, Mr. President. That would be an amendment in the third degree.

Mr. TYDINGS. This is a substitute, not an amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair holds that it comes to the same thing; and the point of order made by the Senator from Wisconsin is sustained.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] to the amendment of the committee.

Several Senators called for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On this question the yeas and nays are demanded.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, so that the Senate may know how much revenue is involved in this matter, under the amendment that was adopted originally by the Committee on Finance we would have raised $110,000,000 from admissions. If the 45-cent provision should be adopted, we would lose $70,000,000 from the original action of the committee.

This morning the Committee on Finance, in order to try to reconcile our differences, met and agreed to accept admissions of 31 cents. When we did that we entailed a loss of $53,000,000. That ought to take care of the smaller theaters.

Those are the facts with reference to the matter. It seems to me that we have gone pretty far.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I recognize exactly what the Senator from Mississippi has said; and if the raising of this revenue were of such tremendous importance, I can not conceive that the Finance Committee, in meeting this morning, would have changed its view as written into this bill. But inasmuch, sir, as the Finance Committee this morning saw fit to rewrite this bill and again to fix rates in this bill at variance with those which have been presented, those of us who have some knowledge of the situation certainly have the right, without being chided for doing it, to present any kind of an appropriate amendment to the action that this morning was taken.

I have grown sick and tired, anyway, of being lectured concerning this bill. It has been said again and again upon this floor that for two weeks and a half—three weeks, I believe it was stated last night—the Finance Committee did its work upon this bill, and wrote a bill; and then when the superman, the Secretary of the Treasury, came into the Finance Committee, in 15 minutes it threw its work out of the window, as was asserted—I use the very term used repeatedly last night—and accepted what the superman, the Secretary of the Treasury, said should be written into the bill.

So, sir, I say that an increase of the exemption upon a cheap theater, such as is asked here, commends itself to those of us who are familiar with the situation, with the class of entertainment that is given, with the necessity that exists for it among our people, particularly at times like these; and I trust the fact that revenue was stricken from the bill by the Finance Committee itself this morning will not interfere with the amendment being adopted by the Senate.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I very much dislike to disagree with the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]; but it was largely in order to make up the revenue which will be lost by raising the exemption from 11 to 31 cents that the committee put back into the bill many of the taxes on certain items which, as I stated last night, had been thrown out of the window.

As a result of our action in reinstating those items, according to the Treasury estimates, we provided for an additional $58,000,000 to be raised by the bill as it now stands.

However, in raising the exemption from 11 cents to 31 cents we sustained a loss of $53,000,000 as compared with the estimates given concerning the admissions tax as reported by the committee originally.

Therefore, there is a net gain of $5,000,000 in so far as the transactions I have just mentioned are concerned. However, prior to the meeting of the committee the action of the Senate had reduced the revenue from automobiles $16,000,000, and reduced the revenue from rubber $20,000,000. So, even if the committee amendment prevails, we will still have a lack of $31,000,000, as estimated by the Treasury, for the balancing of the so-called Budget.

I recognize the appeal which is made on behalf of this industry. I recognize that amusements are an essential part of the life of our community. However, it does seem to me that in view of the urgency which is compelling the Senate to levy these taxes, we have provided for exemption of the lower-priced movies when the committee recommended 31 cents. That means that all of the 10, 20, 25, and 30 cent admissions will be tax free; and on admissions in excess of that the tax will be only 10 per cent.

It does seem to me that under all the circumstances the committee has recommended a fair compromise upon this matter; and may I say that in order to arrive at this compromise we have, as mentioned before, reinstated taxes upon some ten or a dozen items which had previously been eliminated from the bill.

Of course, I do not hope to appeal to the Senators who have already determined their course upon this question; but before the vote was taken I did want to place in the RECORD the exact facts as they now exist.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I do not see that there is any occasion for resentment on the part of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] of the action of the committee in making this concession, nor for the statements that have been made regarding the reasons for it.

We all realize that it is distasteful to impose a tax on amusements; but the arrangement that the committee now proposes addresses itself to my mind as fair.

I should not have favored a proposal to impose a tax on 10-cent admissions; but this proposition, as stated by the Senator from Wisconsin, eliminates all 30-cent admissions and under, and imposes a comparatively small tax on those above that amount.

I do not believe that the Senate will be justified in abandoning the revenue that is sought to be obtained by this amendment.

Of course, it is really comprehensible that it is not a pleasant thing to impose this tax. The same thing applies to a great many other taxes in the bill; but the difficulty of yielding to the persuasive appeals that are made with respect to the elimination or modification of these duties is that if we do yield to them we are likely to find the amount of revenue which will be raised by the bill wholly inadequate for the purposes in mind.

I think this adjustment is a fair compromise and I am going to support it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, there was no resentment upon my part concerning the action of the committee this morning, and I complimented the committee when I made this motion upon the fact that it acted as it did. I am resenting, however, another aspect of the situation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JOHNSON. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. My remarks were based on the statement that I heard the Senator make just a moment ago.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly; and I do not resent the fact that the committee increased the exemption, because, as I repeat, I complimented the committee when I made this motion upon that action. I still congratulate them. I do not, however, relish being read lectures concerning activities that may be taken here in a matter with which I am familiar, as I believe I am familiar with this particular thing.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It was that particular remark that I had in mind. I had not heard anybody read a lecture to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is all right, sir. If anybody does, I will answer—that is all—and it is immaterial who does.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; but my remarks were in reply to that statement. I had not heard anybody read, or attempt to read, a lecture to the Senator from California, so I did not think there was any occasion for resentment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Well, I did, sir. There is where we differ. I heard it. The Senator probably was out of the Chamber, or did not hear it, or maybe he heard it differently from me; but, at any rate, when I conceive that a lecture is read by any person to me in this particular body, I respond as best I can and in appropriate parliamentary fashion.

Now, let us see. Here is what is presented:

We have here a bill that is presented by the Finance Committee with a 10 per cent charge upon 10-cent theaters. The Senator from Arkansas says that he was not satisfied with that. I was not. Many others here were not satisfied with it.

After that bill has been in our possession and upon this floor for a considerable period of time, this morning the Finance Committee meets and raises the exemption in the bill concerning amusements, upon the theory, as stated, as I understand, by the Senator from Wisconsin, that it is a compromise. That is all right. That is the compromise that was agreed upon by the members of the committee, as is their right. But the just thing from the standpoint of those who think they are familiar with this situation is that that exemption should be higher than the compromise that has thus been effected.

While it is asserted that the compromise loses a certain revenue unto this bill and unto the Treasury of the United States, I have heard nobody yet say what is the amount of revenue that is lost by increasing the exemption from 31 cents to 41 cents. But whatever that amount might be, if the 31 cents were a compromise, and 41 cents is the appropriate and the just sort of exemption that should be had, the latter, of course, should prevail, and I ask that the Senate adopt the amendment.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I beg pardon for repeating perhaps some words uttered a few moments ago; but I repeat them for the benefit of those Senators who were not then in the Chamber.

It will be recalled that under the act of 1926 the law read:

> A tax of 1 cent for each 10 cents or fraction thereof of the amount paid for admission to any place, on or after said date, including admission by season ticket or subscription, to be paid by the person paying for such admission, but where the amount paid for admission is 75 cents or less, no tax shall be imposed.

The act was amended in 1928 and it was provided that no tax should be paid on tickets sold for less than $3.

I repeat particularly that when the House Ways and Means Committee had this matter under consideration they gave to it careful thought. They investigated it from all points of the compass and agreed to exempt from tax all admission tickets sold for less than 46 cents, and in that form the bill came to us.

I made an effort in the committee to have the exemption raised to 51 cents. The committee, however, for some time adhered to the rates fixed by the House, but later, I recall, the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] suggested 45 cents instead of 46 cents. That figure remained for some time, when, upon later consideration, the committee did, as stated change the figure and fixed it at 11 cents.

Upon further consideration and after some additional facts were brought to its attention, for good and sufficient reasons, the committee agreed—and reports—to exempt from the tax all such tickets sold for less than 31 cents.

Mr. President, I am tempted to enlarge upon this subject, being somewhat familiar with it. I am not speaking for the producers of pictures, I am not speaking for the theaters as such, or their interests. I am pointing out, however, that this tax, whatever it be, falls upon the patrons of the theaters, and, indeed, falls upon what I may call the great mass of our people, who certainly do need release from troubles and cares in the way suggested by the Senator from Arizona. The burden of this tax will fall upon the poor, upon the great mass of our people.

Moreover, if I may impress this thought upon those who do me the honor to listen, I have authoritative information that, due to the national depression, nearly 5,000 small theaters, in villages, towns, and cities throughout the country, have closed their doors during the last year or two. From the same authoritative sources I am advised that if this tax is placed upon admission tickets there will be thousands of other theaters that will close their doors. I may be asked why I make that statement. It is because of the anticipated and certain falling off of patronage due to this tax proposed to be imposed on admission tickets.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think he is entirely justified in the statement just made, in view of the comparisons which were the basis of the action of the committee, instituted between conditions now and conditions in 1920, 1921, and 1922, based upon conditions then, the great depression that existed, the great fall in commodity prices, the thousands of people who were out of employment, indeed, so many that the Republican Party in their platform denounced the Democrats for precipitating a great panic—I repeat, does the Senator think he is justified in the statement he makes, when the committee and the Treasury Department and their experts predicated the facts which were the basis of the action of the committee upon conditions then existing, which were comparable with the conditions which exist now?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I do think I am justified in making that statement; otherwise I would not have made it, I may say to my learned colleague from Utah.

I am aware of the information brought to the attention of the committee. I am aware of the different views expressed by the several members of the committee. I do not wish to prolong discussion of this matter, but I remember full well the facts as disclosed and the views of different members of the committee. However, at the expense of the time of the Senate, I repeat that for reasons which I will not enlarge upon, there has been a great closing of the doors of theaters throughout the United States; and, from sources which I think reliable, from those engaged in the industry, I feel warranted in making the statement that if this burden is put upon the patrons of the theaters there will be many more doors closed.

I am hopeful, therefore, that the Senate will be disposed to vote for the amendment proposed by my colleague.

To repeat, again and yet again, for those who are not members of our Finance Committee, we first agreed with the House. Later there were changes. To-day we find the committee reporting in favor of exempting from the tax all tickets sold for less than 31 cents. I am earnestly asking that the amendment proposed to the committee's amendment by my colleague be agreed to.

In conference there may be a compromise or the House may stand firm and the Senate recede, or vice versa. Whatever may be done in conference, I am hopeful that the pending amendment will be adopted.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, does not the Senator appreciate the fact that a number of tentative agreements were entered into early in the discussion of the tax bill before the committee? That is to say, for instance, when the subject of the tax on furs or on other products came up, there would be a discussion and it would be said, "We will accept tentatively the action of the House, and after further consideration we may then make a change." Is it not a fact that with respect to the 45-cent agreement it was not a positive, fixed determination but was just a tentative understanding until we had further canvassed the bill and the sources of revenue which might be available?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I grant that so long as the bill was before the committee Senators felt at perfect liberty to change their views. It was not as a law of the Medes and Persians. But there is one thing that we ought to bear in mind. We are looking for revenue. We will not get revenue from closed theaters.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I yield the floor. I do not wish to prolong the matter.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I merely wanted to say that this question does not involve alone the closing of the theaters by any means. There is involved the question of the welfare of the people. We seek to avoid any necessity for placing a tax on medicine. I do not think a better sedative for the suffering or a better stimulant for the depressed can be afforded than through enjoyment of the theater. So, because of my interest in the welfare of the people, I think that we are imposing an undue tax upon them when we seek to find revenue from this particular source.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, it is inconceivable to me that I could have been the cause of the remarks of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], and I am not now sure whether I was or not. When I came into the Chamber I had not heard what other speeches had been made, and I understood that no one had stated what the loss of revenue would be by virtue of the suggested amendment. I am sure that no Senator who heard me in the discussion of this matter, in the wildest flights of his imagination, would think that I was lecturing anybody or giving cause for any remarks, if the remarks of the Senator from California were directed to me, because I merely stated what revenue would be received from the various percentages which might be employed.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I do not want to delay the Senate, but I do desire to state that when the Finance Committee had concluded its consideration of the bill, on the Thursday night referred to, there was in the bill $125,000,000 more in revenue from income taxes and $70,000,000 less in revenue from admission taxes.

What the Secretary of the Treasury did was to have the committee take out $125,000,000 of taxes to be paid by the income-tax payers receiving incomes in excess of $3,000, and to put back into the bill $70,000,000, to be paid by the theater goers who visit theaters where the admission charge is 10 cents or higher. So that the great care and the great conservation advocated for revenue was wholly disregarded when it came to the sources from which the revenue was to be obtained.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the senior Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HASTINGS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] to the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma (when his name was called). I again announce my general pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If privileged to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I again announce my general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. If he were present, I understand he would vote as I expect to vote, and therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] is paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN].

Mr. SHIPSTEAD (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY] voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I have a special pair with that Senator. Not knowing how she would vote, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. BYRNES. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]; and

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY].

Mr. KING. Mr. President, for the purpose of later entering a motion to reconsider, I change my vote from "nay" to "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 44, nays 33, as follows:

So Mr. JOHNSON'S amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, was the announcement I made a moment ago a sufficient notice of my purpose to enter a motion to reconsider?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That notice will be entered.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the paragraph now under consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 269, line 2, after the word "imposed," strike out the period and insert a semicolon and add——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator from New York that the amendment is not in order now. We must first dispose of the amendment of the senior Senator from Utah as amended by the vote of the Senate just taken.

Mr. WAGNER. I ask that my amendment may be considered as soon as we dispose of the amendment referred to by the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator may offer it at that time.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I have an amendment that I ask may be considered immediately following the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah as amended by the vote of the Senate just taken.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 269, line 1, to strike out "11 cents" and insert "41 cents," and in line 13, to strike out "11 cents" and insert "41 cents," so as to read:

(a) Paragraph (1) of section 500 (a) of the revenue act of 1926, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(1) A tax of 1 cent for each 10 cents or fraction thereof of the amount paid for admission to any place, including admission by season ticket or subscription, to be paid by the person paying for such admission; except that in case the amount paid for admission is less than 41 cents, no tax shall be imposed. In the case of persons (except bona fide employees, municipal officers on official business, and children under 12 years of age) admitted free or at reduced rates to any place at a time when and under circumstances under which an admission charge is made to other persons, an equivalent tax shall be collected based on the price so charged to such other persons for the same or similar accommodations, to be paid by the person so admitted. Amounts paid for admission by season ticket or subscription shall be exempt only if the amount which would be charged to the holder or subscribed for a single admission is less than 41 cents."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 270, line 25, after the word "than," to strike out "46 cents" and insert "41 cents," so as to read:

(e) Effective July 1, 1934, section 500 (a) (1) of the revenue act of 1926, as amended by subsection (a) of this section, is amended by striking out "less than 41 cents" wherever appearing in such paragraph, and inserting in lieu thereof "$3 or less."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York is recognized.

Mr. WAGNER. I give way so the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] may address the Chair.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, on page 268 the Finance Committee originally inserted an amendment in line 21 fixing a tax of 25 per cent on admissions to horse or dog races, which was different from the regular 10 per cent tax.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, that amendment was rejected.

Mr. BARKLEY. I was going to inquire what had been done with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been rejected. The Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] offers the following amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 269, in line 2, after the word "imposed," strike out the period, insert a colon, and add:

Provided, That in the case of legitimate spoken drama, if the amount paid for admission is less than $3, no tax shall be imposed. As used in this subdivision, the term "legitimate spoken drama" means a spoken play, whether or not set to music or with musical parts or accompaniments, which is a consecutive narrative interpreted by a single set of characters, all necessary to the development of the plot, in two or more acts, the performance consuming more than 1 hour and 45 minutes of time.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, the amendment would retain the law as it is now so far as the spoken drama is concerned by exempting admission charges up to $3 and imposing a tax of 10 per cent on admissions above $3. The senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] made such an intellectual and persuasive presentation of the subject a moment ago that anything I say would be merely an anticlimax.

I would like to have read at the desk, however, a letter which I received from a number of producers interested in this industry which explains the economic situation with reference to the theater.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEAR SENATOR:

The legitimate theater has never objected to a tax on tickets costing $3 and over. Such a tax is still in force. It desires to be taxed no further. The contemplated tax will affect the occupants of balcony and gallery seats, the poorer playgoers who will be deterred from attending by a 10 per cent admission tax on the box-office price.

It is estimated the additional amount to be obtained from this tax will be less than $1,000,000, one one-thousandth of the total revenue needed. This is a mere bagatelle from the standpoint of taxation, but it represents a very decided handicap to an institution which is tottering and moribund. We need only call your attention to the fact that 70 per cent of the legitimate theaters throughout the country are closed, that over 60 per cent of the musicians, stagehands, and actors are unemployed, that important managers whose names have been a household word throughout the Nation for the past three decades are bankrupt, and that many parts of the country have on account of the dark theaters been denied the entertainment and the experience of the legitimate drama, so that there are parts of the country to-day where the traditions of Shakespeare, Barrie, the great classic dramatists of all literature, are unknown to them.

The contemplated tax of 10 per cent on the legitimate drama is a tax on culture. Civilized countries throughout the world have subsidized their theaters on the ground that they are necessary to the cultural life of the people. Especially in times of depression is the legitimate theater a necessity. Woodrow Wilson declared the legitimate theater throughout the World War an essential industry. Surely in times of depression, when the morale of the people should be bolstered up, a tax which will add to the economic debacle of the living, flesh and blood theater is undesirable.

We therefore urge you to support Senator WAGNER'S amendment on the floor of the Senate, and thereby merit the gratitude of all lovers of the theater, of whom there are legion.

Respectfully,

Arthur Hopkins, president the League of New York Theaters (Inc.); Frank Gillmore, president Actors' Equity Association; Owen David, the Dramatists' Guild of the Authors' League of America (Inc.); Luise Silcox, the Dramatists' Guild of the Authors' League of America (Inc.); Edward Childs Carpenter, president American Dramatists; Fred J. Dempsey, secretary-treasurer International Alliance Theatrical Stage Employees; James Brennan, president Theatrical Protective Union No. 1; Joseph N. Weber, president American Federation of Musicians of the United States and Canada; Edward Canavan, chairman American Federation of Musicians, Local 802; Walter R. Percival, president United Scenic Artists of America; Lee Shubert; Charles B. Dillingham; Gilbert Miller; Marcus Heiman; L. Lawrence Weber; Lawrence Langner; Brock Pemberton; Sam H. Harris; Kenneth Macgowan; Rowland Stebbins; Max Gordon; Winthrop Ames; Judge Mitchell L. Erlanger; Arch Selwyn; Herman Shumlin; William A. Brady; Morris Gest; Jed Harris; Dwight Deere Wiman; George White; Earl Carroll; Alexander McKaig; Doran, Ray & Hewes; Ed Wynn; Mary Boland; Laurette Taylor; George Jessel; Donald Brian; Jane Cowl; Selena Royle; Ernest Truex; Paul Muni; Leslie Howard; Henry Stephenson; Alice Brady; Ruth Gordon; Osgood Perkins; Eddie Dowling; Frank Craven; Basil Rathbone; Fannie Hurst; Heywood Broun; Austin Strong; Bob Sherwood.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I do not want to reiterate what has been said already so eloquently in behalf of the spoken drama. I would like to reiterate some statistics which were presented as to the stifled condition of the industry, or institution, as I prefer to call it, because undoubtedly it is one of the vehicles for our cultural heritage, and while we tax it in our country the European countries regard it so important as a cultural influence upon their people that not only do they not tax it but actually subsidize so as to preserve and insure its continued life.

Mr. Frank Gilmore, president of the Actors' Equity Association, stated before the committee that in 1929 there were 7,466 actors employed; that in 1931 the number had decreased to 3,730. In 1928 there were 20,000 musicians employed in the theaters of the United States. To-day there are probably not more than 8,000 employed.

The secretary of the Theatrical Protective Union, an organization of stage hands in the New York district, states that fully half the membership of that organization is now unemployed.

Even the most optimistic calculation, I think, will show that less than a million dollars in revenue are involved, and yet, for the sake of exacting a million dollars, and perhaps not getting more than half of it, we are to destroy the spoken drama, the legitimate stage, when it is so badly needed as a cultural influence.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I may say to the Senator that there was no group that appeared before the Finance Committee who made a stronger impression on the committee, in my opinion, than the group referred to. Their appeal was a powerful one, and when the question was voted on the committee divided, I think, 9 to 8, whether or not the proposal would be carried out.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I suppose when the court is with the advocate he should stop talking.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, my mind goes back to the period of the World War, when the spoken word in the theater was an inspiration to our people. Now the drama is in distress; the keen competition of the radio, the moving picture, canned music, and canned oratory has almost destroyed the profession of the actor in America.

As the distinguished Senator from New York has said, in other countries especial attention is given to the development of this talent, which is employed to entertain and amuse the people. As it is, in our country the actors' profession is almost a dying one, largely because of the competition of mechanical devices.

What is a million dollars in taxes compared to the preservation of the stage and of the fine actors who portray for our people stories of the past and visions of things that are to come, and entertain them when they ought to be entertained in these days of depression? I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New York how we can justify ourselves in exempting from tax a man who pays $2.50 to go to the theater to witness the spoken drama, while we tax a man 10 per cent who goes to see a moving-picture show? What justification is there for Congress taking such action?

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, of course admission fees are higher in the case of the spoken drama because it is so much more expensive to produce; but what we may call the poorer classes, who are still thirsting for the literature of the stage, will pay $3 for admission to the balcony and a little less for gallery seats. It is that class of people who under my amendment would be exempt from the payment of the tax. For orchestra seats, as a rule, in the better-type theaters the admission charge is more than $3, and those who buy such seats would, of course, under the bill be taxed.

Mr. COUZENS. Does the Senator mean that the man who pays $2.75 to go to see the spoken drama can not pay a 10 per cent tax?

Mr. WAGNER. That has been the experience, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. COUZENS. Just how can we afford to tax to the extent of 4 cents the man who goes to the moving-picture show and has only 40 cents to spend and exempt the man who pays $2.50 for a ticket in order to attend a performance of the spoken drama?

Mr. WAGNER. The cost of producing the talking moving pictures is very much less than the cost of producing the spoken drama, so that of necessity a higher fee has to be charged for the latter.

Mr. COUZENS. That is true, but one must pay the price or he can not go.

Mr. WAGNER. A tax by increasing the price has the same effect upon the theatergoer that a tax on automobiles has on the purchasers of automobiles, for whom the Senator pleaded the other day.

Mr. COUZENS. Both Senators from New York have voted to tax the farmer and the little merchant from $25 to $30 on their cars; they voted against the amendment offered by my colleague proposing a reduction in the tax on automobiles and they said that the addition of $25 to the price of an automobile was "the bunk." The senior Senator from New York said that it did not deter sales, and yet his colleague rises in the Senate and insists that a tax of 25 cents in addition to the admission charge for the spoken drama will deter theatergoers. I think the Senators had better analyze their own voting records when they say that in one instance a tax of $25 does not make any difference to the farmer or the little merchant who has to buy a motor car, but that a tax of 25 cents will deter a man from going to a theater.

Mr. WAGNER. As a matter of fact, I voted with the Senator for the reduction in the tax proposed by the committee.

Mr. COUZENS. The senior Senator from New York did not.

Mr. WAGNER. If the Senator will examine the RECORD he will find that I voted with him for a reduction in the tax.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I voted against the amendment of the committee.

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; but the Senator voted to retain the tax in the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. I did, and I am very much interested to hear the Senator admit that the consumer is going to pay the tax. He was here to defend the manufacturer; he was here to take care of the manufacturers of motor cars in Detroit, and argued that the tax would be a great burden on them. I never heard the argument that the consumer, the poor consumer, was going to pay the tax. That is entirely new.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, just a moment. The Senator has overlooked the argument made by my colleague that the tax would be passed on and that the consumer would pay it; it always has been passed on. When the tax was in force before it was added to the purchaser's bill.

Mr. COPELAND. If that is the attitude of the Senator from Michigan, and he wants to protect the man who pays the tax, he will certainly vote for my colleague's amendment in this instance in order to save the man from paying the tax.

Mr. COUZENS. In other words, I should vote to save 25 cents to the man who has $2.50 to spend to go to the spoken drama, but I should vote for a $25 tax on the man who has to buy a truck with which to make his living.

Mr. COPELAND. He pays that tax on a car only once in five or six years. I hope he is going to go to the theater a good many times each year, for no matter how poor a man may be, he has the same aspirations for culture, spoken of so eloquently by the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] a little while ago, as has the rich man.

Mr. COUZENS. I do not find any fault with that, but why should we impose a tax of 10 per cent on a man who has only 45 cents to spend with which to go to a movie, and refuse to put a 10 per cent tax on a man who has $2.50 with which to go to see the spoken drama in a theater? I do not see the consistency of it.

Mr. WAGNER. May I say to the Senator I have not refused to do any such thing; I voted for the amendment as it was presented, which increased the exemption.

Mr. COUZENS. That is quite true.

Mr. WAGNER. I have not said that I would not vote for a still further exemption in the case of the moving-picture admissions.

Mr. COUZENS. But in the condition in which the bill now is, everybody who goes to any amusement to which the admission costs more than 45 cents pays a 10 per cent tax. Why should particular forms of entertainment be exempted when a tax of 10 per cent is placed on admissions to most of the little moving-picture theaters throughout the Nation?

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, the condition of the industry now is such that it is pretty nearly stifled because of the depression and because of terrific competition which it is undergoing, and the question is, Shall we, for the sake of raising possibly less than a million dollars, take the chance of destroying this cultural institution? Furthermore, the Senator knows that nearly all the great literature of the English language was written primarily to be produced upon the stage, and that it will be a sad day for this country when the spoken drama goes out of existence. I do not think we ought to take the chance of destroying this great influence for culture.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, it is not a question of taxation; it is not a question of drawing a distinction between a moving-picture show and a $3 entertainment; the issue is different from that. It is whether we are going to preserve the profession of the actor, the old stage, the men and women who portray Shakespeare, the men and women who follow the traditions of Florence, and the other great actors and actresses of the past. It is not a question of taxation; it is a question of preserving that fine artistic industry in America. That is the viewpoint that I take, and that is why I shall support the amendment of the Senator from New York.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, of course all taxes are burdensome. I would like very much to see admissions to all theaters free of taxes; I do not think there is any question that all would like to see that situation. I do not think the particular industry for which the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] speaks so eloquently is in any worse condition than is any other industry. The letters that come to me from all over the United States in behalf of the moving-picture industry tell the same story that the Senator from New York now is telling us about the spoken drama. The same story comes from everybody who is being taxed in this bill, and, while some of them are perfectly selfish and sometimes unreasonable, the great majority of them make a good case. Industries are all languishing; they are all suffering. The story the Senator from New York tells about the dying industry of the stage is the same story told over and over again by every other industry.

Mr. President, while we had rather not levy the tax, I myself can not understand why we should permit the theaters covered by this amendment to be free from tax where the admission is less than $3, and then tax to the extent of 10 per cent those theaters where the admission is 50 cents. The moving picture is a little different, but it is languishing just the same, and the plea comes every day from all over the United States not to tax it. There is no difference that I can see so far as the suffering of the industry is concerned.

Mr. President, a person who is able to pay $3 to go to a theater is better able to pay a 10 per cent tax on admission tickets than is the person who goes to a movie show where the admission is 50 cents able to pay the 10 per cent tax upon his admission.

One reason why the spoken drama is passing out and having the hardships so well described by the Senator from New York is that the admission fee is too high. If the price of admission were reduced, thousands of people who are not able now to go would be glad to go. It is the price the ordinary person has to pay for admission to these theaters that keeps him from patronizing them.

The Senator from Missouri said that his mind went back to the days of the war, when all these various sorts of entertainments were brought out. Mr. President, my mind goes back away beyond the war, probably to a time before the Senator from Missouri was born. I recognize what an effort it was to go to see Hamlet, or Julius Cæsar, or Macbeth, or The Merchant of Venice. I have seen them all in those days to which my mind goes back; and in those days I never paid more than a dollar to see them. I was not able to get the best seat. I did not get quite as good an education from seeing them in the way of developing culture and higher sentiments as the person who was able to pay $1.50 to get a better seat; but a dollar was all that thousands of people could afford, and now they can not afford to pay the dollar. The only way to get relief is to reduce the price of admission.

I do not believe that those who are advocating the exemption from taxation of admissions up to $3 are justified in making the claim that they do. I do not believe we would be justified in taxing the lower-priced admissions and letting the higher-priced admissions go. It would be like levying an income tax on the man with the $1,000 income and levying no income tax upon the man who had an income of $10,000.

I recognize the propaganda that has gone on in favor of this amendment. I presume all Senators, if they have read what has come to them, have read volumes along the line of the argument made by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. It probably appealed to all of us, as I know it did to me. But since we must tax, since we must have revenue, it is far better to get the revenue from the man who is able to pay $3 admission than it is from the poor fellow who has only a half dollar, and has to content himself with going to a spoken movie. That is a method of education that is newer than the spoken drama. It is getting better all the time. Everybody recognizes its educational value. Why levy a tax upon it, and not levy a tax upon those theaters where the admission is higher?

To my mind, Mr. President, we are unreasonable and illogical if we exempt from taxation these higher admissions. If the Senator's amendment had a limitation on it that was somewhere within the ability of the ordinary person in these times to buy a ticket and pay for it, I might feel a little differently about the matter; but if we will take care of the fellows who have only 40 cents to buy a theater ticket, the fellows who have $3 to buy a ticket will take care of themselves.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. [Putting the question.] The Chair is in doubt.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HASTINGS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, on page 270, after line 5, to strike out:

(e) The exemption from tax provided by subdivision (b) (1) (A) shall not be allowed in the case of admissions to wrestling matches, prize fights, or boxing, sparring, or other pugilistic matches or exhibitions. The exemption from tax provided by subdivision (b) (1) shall not be allowed in the case of admissions to any athletic game or exhibition the proceeds of which inure wholly or partly to the benefit of any college or university (including any academy of the military or naval forces of the United States).

And in lieu thereof to insert:

The exemption from tax provided by subdivision (b) (1) (A) shall not be allowed in the case of admissions to wrestling matches, prize fights, or boxing, sparring, or other pugilistic matches or exhibitions, except in the case of admissions the proceeds of which inure exclusively to the benefit of educational institutions.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 271, after line 2, to insert:

SEC. 712. ADMISSION TO OLYMPIC GAMES

The tax imposed by section 500 of the revenue act of 1926, as amended, shall not be imposed in respect of admission to the games of the Tenth Olympiad, to be held in the United States in the calendar year 1932.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, while we are passing upon the question of admission charges I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Finance if an exemption is made on admissions to agricultural and industrial fairs?

Mr. SMOOT. The existing law provides for that.

Mr. TRAMMELL. This bill does not make any alteration in the existing law in that exemption?

Mr. SMOOT. None whatever.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I thank the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk which I desire to offer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 243, after line 13, the Senator from Nevada proposes to insert:

(4) An excise tax of 1 cent per pound shall be levied on the metallic manganese content of all imports into the United States of manganese ore (including ferruginous manganese ore) or concentrates and manganiferous iron ore, all the foregoing containing in excess of 10 per cent of metallic manganese; and an excise tax of 1⅞ cents per pound shall be levied on the metallic manganese content of all imports into the United States of manganese metal, manganese silicon, ferromanganese, and spiegeleisen.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, on April 11, 1932, I introduced an amendment to H. R. 10236 providing for an excise tax of 1 cent per pound on manganese imported into the United States. The reference in the proposed amendment was to page 232 between lines 15 and 16 in the bill as passed by the House. This reference should now be changed to page 243 after line 13 of the bill as reported by the Senate Committee on Finance.

When the 1922 tariff bill was under consideration, American manganese producers requested a duty of 2 cents per pound, and the Congress reduced that to 1 cent per pound, which proved to be inadequate protection to the domestic industry. Imports continued to increase, and these facts I made available to the Senate when the 1930 tariff bill was being considered.

The Congress in the 1930 tariff bill again provided a 1-cent duty on manganese, and since this act went into effect almost the entire American market has been monopolized by foreign manganese producers, principally Soviet Russia, where the costs of production under the communist system are nominal.

The American manganese industry to-day is very largely shut down, contributing materially to unemployment, and I have consequently offered an amendment to the tax bill now before the Senate to impose an excise tax on manganese imports into the United States.

From my intimate knowledge of American manganese developments in the United States since 1922, I am more convinced than ever of the need for the additional protection which will be afforded by the enactment of the proposed amendment which I have introduced, providing for a tax of 1 cent per pound on manganese imports. I am also certain that the amount of protection thus afforded will be no more than sufficient to allow the manganese industry of the United States the opportunity to compete for one-third of the domestic market requirements.

In brief, this excise tax will not be prohibitory, but will probably result in a revenue to the Government based upon two-thirds of the manganese imported into the United States.

In 1931 there were 502,518 gross tons of manganese ore and 22,000 tons of ferromanganese and other manganese alloys imported into the United States. With a tax of 1 cent per pound on the metallic manganese content of the ore and with 1⅞ cents per pound on the metallic manganese content of ferromanganese, covering only two-thirds of the total imports in 1931 as stated above, the revenue to the Government would be $4,069,648.

The manganese industry to-day is well equipped to supply one-third of the domestic requirements and is asking for no more than sufficient protection to give it this small share of the business. It is to be expected, and it will naturally follow that if the American manganese industry is afforded this tax protection that it will grow in size and that metallurgical improvements will tend to reduce the cost of American production so as to enable the industry in the years to come to obtain a larger share of the domestic market.

In all of the tariff campaigns the importance of manganese as a war essential material has been stressed, and if the American industry is compelled to remain shut down and the incentive of the American producers is to be killed, this country will continue to be dependent upon foreign sources of manganese supply.

Manganese has come to occupy an ever-increasing importance in the manufacture of steel, and this to-day constitutes the principal demand for it, and this country should be absolutely independent of foreign manganese.

With the enactment of the amendment which I now propose, I believe that the American manganese industry will be given a reasonable opportunity to develop and ultimately to satisfy all the Nation's requirements.

The ore resources of this country are distributed in some 34 States and are unlimited in volume, and there is no reason why this country should not be obsolutely independent of foreign sources of manganese.

The War Department on several previous occasions has called the Nation's attention to the importance of manganese in our Nation's defense, and that department is still greatly concerned over the situation.

I wish to offer for the RECORD a letter of the Hon. F. H. Payne, Assistant Secretary of War, to Mr. Howard H. Cook, secretary of the American Iron and Steel Institute, on February 12, 1932, which I quote, as follows:

FEBRUARY 12, 1932.

Mr. HOWARD H. COOK,
Secretary American Iron and Steel Institute,
New York City.

MY DEAR MR. COOK: The question of assuring during war time an adequate supply of manganese ore to maintain the production of the steel industry at the rate demanded by any military program is one that has received much thought in the War Department. This question resolves itself into a situation in which foreign sources of this ore are denied to this country, and reliance must be placed on domestic or near-by producers.

It has come to the attention of the War Department that the Cuban American Manganese Co., a subsidiary of the Freeport Texas Co., has expended considerable effort and capital to determine methods to produce from Cuban manganese ores a product which will be the equal in every way of foreign ores now largely used by the steel industry and which can be marketed in this country on a price basis comparing favorably with foreign ores. The department is informed that both of these objectives have been attained.

In view of the dependence of the military requirements upon steel products and of the supreme importance of manganese in the making of sound steel, it is deemed essential to have available at the beginning of a major war a domestic or near-by operating source of manganese ore.

To create such an operating source during peace time the producers must have a market for their output. It is therefore suggested that you bring to the attention of the members of the institute, who are consumers of manganese ore, the viewpoint of the War Department and its hope that the domestic and Cuban projects may possess sufficient merit to warrant their assistance in encouraging the development during peace time of these sources of manganese supply for war-time needs.

Because I know of their interest in this matter, I am taking the liberty of sending a copy of this letter to Mr. Farrell, of the United States Steel Co.; Mr. Grace, of Bethlehem Steel Co.; Mr. Ricks, of the Union Carbide Co.; and Mr. Lavino, of Lavino & Co.

Sincerely yours,

F. H. PAYNE,
The Assistant Secretary of War.

Secretary Payne also addressed a letter on the same day to the principal manganese consumers in the United States requesting their cooperation, and I introduced the same for the RECORD:

FEBRUARY 12, 1932.

Mr. JAMES A. FARRELL, 71 Broadway, New York City; Mr. EUGENE G. GRACE, 25 Broadway, New York City; Mr. J. J. RICKS, President Union Carbide & Carbon Co., 30 East Forty-second Street, New York City; Mr. E. M. LAVINO, Philadelphia, Pa.

MY DEAR MR. FARRELL: The question of assuring during the war an adequate supply of manganese ore to maintain the production of the steel industry at the rate demanded by the expected military program is one that has received much thought in the War Department. Recently there has been brought to our attention the effort of the Cuban American Manganese Co. to produce from Cuban manganese ores a product which will, to a large extent, meet our war-time requirements.

In order to bring to the attention of the manganese consumers the interest of the War Department in domestic and near-by production I have written a letter to the secretary of the American Iron and Steel Institute, copy of which I inclose. I shall very much appreciate whatever attention you may desire to give to this matter.

Sincerely yours,

F. H. PAYNE,
The Assistant Secretary of War.

Assistant Secretary of War Payne, in his letter to the American Iron and Steel Institute, which I have just placed in the RECORD, makes the following statements concerning the importance of manganese to the national defense:

The question of assuring during war time an adequate supply of manganese ore to maintain the production of the steel industry at the rate demanded by any military program is one that has received much thought in the War Department. This question resolves itself into a situation in which foreign sources of this ore are denied to this country and reliance must be placed on domestic or near-by producers.

In view of the dependence of the military requirements upon steel products and of the supreme importance of manganese in the making of sound steel, it is deemed essential to have available at the beginning of a major war a domestic or near-by operating source of manganese ore.

On April 19, 1932, I appeared before the Senate Committee on Finance and made a statement in behalf of this amendment. Mr. J. Carson Adkerson, the president of the American Manganese Producers' Association, on the same day presented detailed information concerning the condition of the industry and its ability to meet domestic requirements if afforded this additional protection.

His statement emphasized the fact that the industry could no longer survive unless it received the relief afforded in this emergency tax provision, and that such mines as have been opened would be compelled to shut down and fill with water and the plant and equipment, which has been established, either to be dismantled or to disintegrate. On a subsequent occasion, at the request of Senator SHORTRIDGE, the Assistant Secretary of War Payne appeared before the Committee on Finance in executive session and there presented a complete statement, setting forth the reasons why the Government's national defense required a domestic manganese supply.

Mr. President, with this effort on the part of the War Department adequately to protect the welfare of the Nation by requesting the cooperation of the steel industry with the domestic manganese producers, there should be encountered no opposition to the imposition of the small tax proposed. The proposed amendment should be construed as one-third protection and two-thirds revenue, which at this time should be welcome to those who are seeking ways and means to increase the income of the United States and to balance the Budget. The stimulus afforded to the American manganese industry will also result in the employment of some 50,000 men and in increasing the sources from which income taxes may be derived.

There is no item in the tax bill now before the Senate which is more important from a national standpoint and none which can claim more importance to the national defense than the proposed tax on manganese imports.

At the present time the United States is dependent upon foreign sources of supply and is receiving the larger portion of its manganese ore from Soviet Russia. No longer should this Nation's safety be dependent upon foreign sources of manganese supply.

I feel sure the Senate will appreciate that this issue is one which transcends partisan consideration, and I make the broad appeal that the Senate unite in the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to ask the Senator about the production of manganese. How much is produced in the Senator's State?

Mr. ODDIE. There is none produced there now.

Mr. NORRIS. Would the tariff which the Senator is proposing result in building up the industry in the Senator's State?

Mr. ODDIE. It will be the means of bringing an industry into 34 States of the Union. Manganese is found in 34 States. Some of the deposits are exceedingly large and important; others are smaller.

Mr. NORRIS. Are the other places of production all closed up?

Mr. ODDIE. They are all closed up now.

Mr. NORRIS. Then there is no manganese produced in this country?

Mr. ODDIE. No; because all we use is being brought in from foreign countries.

Mr. NORRIS. What are the importations?

Mr. ODDIE. I have just given the statistics as to the importations. In 1931 there were imported 502,518 gross tons.

Mr. NORRIS. Was there any domestic production at all?

Mr. ODDIE. There was a small production before that, less than 300,000 tons, before this large importation started. These foreign importations have resulted in practically closing down the entire American manganese-producing industry.

Mr. NORRIS. The idea of this bill is to raise revenue, as I understand it. Would this tariff increase the revenue?

Mr. ODDIE. Yes; it would increase the revenue something over four million dollars.

Mr. NORRIS. In order to be of any benefit to the industry the Senator wants to revive, would we not have to make the tariff high enough to amount practically to an embargo?

Mr. ODDIE. It would take some years for the American manganese industry, with the proper protection, to reach a point where it could produce all that is consumed in the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. Was not the matter fought out fully in connection with the consideration of the last tariff bill?

Mr. ODDIE. Yes; but the tariff imposed at that time has since been found to be inadequate.

Mr. NORRIS. What is the tariff now?

Mr. ODDIE. One cent on ores containing over 10 per cent metallic content of manganese.

Mr. NORRIS. What is the revenue now?

Mr. ODDIE. I do not know off-hand what the revenue is.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator think by keeping out some of the imports we will increase the amount of revenue?

Mr. ODDIE. By imposing the tax which I am suggesting, the American manganese industry can come into production again.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the point I am trying to bring out. In other words, it is a protective tariff the Senator wants applied?

Mr. ODDIE. Not altogether. I should like to see an adequate protective tariff, but this 1-cent excise tax will be a step in the right direction. This tax will enable the American manganese industry to produce, at the start, one-third of what we consume, and it will raise a revenue from the other two-thirds of the consumption in this country from importations and thereby produce a revenue of something over $4,000,000.

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator how he voted on the other tariff items, for instance, the amendment reducing the tariff on aluminum offered by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS].

Mr. ODDIE. My recollection is I voted against that amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator think that we ought to vote down all other tariff items and permit this item of his to go in the bill, as we did the coal and lumber and oil and copper tariffs?

Mr. ODDIE. No; I do not think so, because the Senate has already voted to put oil and copper, lumber and coal in the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. How did the Senator vote on those items?

Mr. ODDIE. I voted for them.

Mr. NORRIS. Does that mean the Senator was in on the combination?

Mr. ODDIE. I was in on no combination at all.

Mr. NORRIS. Was his vote an attempt to get in on the combination?

Mr. ODDIE. I can not answer that question. I voted on each one of these items as I think I should have, just as the Senator from Nebraska votes his own convictions.

Mr. President, this matter has been thrashed out time and again on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator to propound a further question? How did the Senator vote on the farmers' effort to get the equalization-fee amendment adopted?

Mr. ODDIE. It is a debatable question whether that particular item is the wisest way of helping the farmer. I have voted time and again for measures that would help the farmer.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the only opportunity the Senator has had in this case and he voted against it, did he not?

Mr. ODDIE. I felt that other measures would be of more benefit to the farmer. I felt there were certain features in that particular item to which the Senator from Nebraska refers that were not economically sound. We differ on some of these matters, but this manganese amendment is a clear-cut proposition. I think I have stated it plainly. It has been stated time and again on the floor of the Senate, and I think we will be able to agree to it. It will mean much to American industry. It will put thousands of men back to work and help to start us on the road to being economically independent. It will help us from the standpoint of the national defense.

Mr. President, on my amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, Minnesota has over 50,000,000 tons of known reserves of low-grade manganese ores. Processes have been developed at the Minnesota School of Mines for the successful recovery from these low-grade ores of the highest-grade manganese ore known in the world's market. The practicability of these processes has been attested to by the United States Bureau of Mines and the United States War Department.

The attention of the Senators should be forcibly called to the serious situation during the last war arising from a shortage of manganese. The situation is best expressed in the language of Maj. Alfred H. Hobley, now in charge of the Raw Materials Division of the War Department, in a meeting recently held in Washington between the manganese producers and the War Department, at which time he said:

Everything was going along smoothly then until something interfered with the shipping, and that something was both a shortage of shipping and the sinking of vessels. In one case the situation became sufficiently critical for the Navy to agree to send the naval collier Cyclops to Brazil for a load of manganese that was particularly necessary, and unfortunately the Cyclops was sunk en route, never heard of after its departure from the port in Brazil. So that the steel people became very much concerned about how they were going to continue their manufacture of steel and obtain the necessary quality and grade required for the manufacture of military munitions.

I would like the privilege of inserting into the RECORD a copy of resolutions passed by the Republican convention in Minnesota with 15 Minnesota counties represented.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions passed by the Sixth District Republican Convention, Minnesota, with 15 Minnesota counties represented, April 30, 1932

Whereas manganese is a mineral recognized by the War Department as most essential to this country's preservation in times of war, and whereas it has been shown that Minnesota is one of the sources of a domestic manganese supply more than sufficient in quantity for the manufacture into steel of all of the known United States reserves of iron ore; and

Whereas the existing tariff on manganese has ceased to be an effectual protection to domestic supplies of this essential mineral because of the dumping in the United States of Russian ores, produced by the convict or forced labor of the soviet régime, at prices far below cost of domestic production; and

Whereas the State of Minnesota contains in excess of a proven 50,000,000 tons of low-grade manganese or manganiferous iron ores at present nonmerchantable and with their development at a standstill due to inadequate protection; and

Whereas ore-treatment processes have been perfected (the practicability of which is attested to by our University School of Mines, the United States Bureau of Mines, and the United States War Department), which will provide a conversion of these ores into merchantable manganese if and when vicious foreign competition is eliminated; and

Whereas it is believed an internal tax on manganese imports will effect a cessation of foreign dumping and a rehabilitation of the local industry, thus providing increased employment and increased tax revenue to our district and to the State of Minnesota: Therefore be it

Resolved, That manganese-ore production constitutes an infant industry of this State and the United States which it is imperative to foster and to adequately protect; and be it further

Resolved, That we accordingly indorse Senator ODDIE's amendment to the revenue bill for an excise tax of 1 cent per pound on the metallic manganese content of imported ores, and that we emphatically urge our Senators and Representatives in Congress to exert their untiring efforts toward an early enactment of said measure.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote on the question of the disagreement of the Senate to the committee amendment on the spoken-drama tax.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will be entered.

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, I desire to submit to the Senate a resolution adopted to-day in Washington by the National Wholesale Jewelers Association, as follows:

The National Wholesale Jewelers Association, in convention assembled, unanimously beseeches Congress to adopt the small manufacturers' sales tax in order to balance the Budget instead of a discriminatory excise tax on a few industries.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I feel that I should state my reasons for voting against the amendment submitted by my colleague. In doing so I do not raise the question of whether an increase in tariff is justified or not.

In voting for certain tariffs on the revenue bill, which it is admitted will raise revenue, I did so because I hold the view that when substantial industries of the country—that is, large industries which are more or less universal throughout the country—are suffering destruction by reason of sudden and overpowering competition from abroad, they demand our attention. The House of Representatives had certain industries called to its attention that seemed to come within that category. The committee which prepared the bill now under consideration was certainly opposed to an increase in tariff duties on imports into this country. In my opinion nothing could have induced the committee to have recommended an import duty upon those articles which it did recommend except the most extradordinary conditions.

With one of those items I am familiar, and probably my familiarity with the condition of that particular commodity caused me to listen to the debate in regard to the others and to admit in my own mind, even if I did not come to a definite conclusion, that possibly the same condition applied to them. For instance, I will illustrate my meaning, if possible, by a reference to that industry with which I am personally familiar. I am speaking of the copper industry.

The question of placing copper upon the dutiable list, of course, was brought up during the time the last general tariff act was being considered. It was considered unnecessary at that time to place any tariff on it for equalizing competition between the industry at home and abroad. Revenues were not needed then as they are now and therefore there was no serious effort made to place copper on the dutiable list. But conditions since that time have entirely changed, and those who will not change their position with changing conditions are not valuable judges or legislators, nor do I feel it worth while for any Senator to waste his time talking to them.

As a matter of fact, when the tariff bill was passed copper was selling at a good price. It has dropped since from 23 cents a pound to 5½ cents a pound. That drop possibly has been similar to the drop in other industries, it may be said, but not with the same effect. All industries are suffering from the low prices of their products and many of them are making no profit; but the condition of the copper industry is worse. For two years the copper industry has been producing copper at a cost of twice its selling price.

Is there any distinction in that? For two years the copper industry, for the purpose of keeping its mines and its smelters operating and maintaining its organization and supporting its miners and their families, who have been with them for 20 or 30 years, has been operating at a deficit. Copper companies have been operating by spending their cash reserves.

The Nevada Consolidated Copper Co., which is one of the largest copper companies in the United States, has exhausted nearly $500,000 of its cash reserve in attempting to keep its plant running at 20 per cent capacity. It can not do it any longer unless it assesses its stockholders. The directors would like to keep the plants going for the reasons I have stated. The stockholders will not be assessed unless they know there is some hope. But what is the hope? I do not know that the 4 cents tariff duty which has been placed on that product will be of any great advantage. I do know that it will allow them to continue their plants on a basis of 20 per cent operation without shutting down, and I conceive that to be a very laudible accomplishment.

As I said, there has been a change in conditions since the last tariff act was passed. When that act passed, copper was selling at a good price. According to the Bureau of Mines the cost of the production of copper in this country, taking the lowest and the highest prices, is about 12 cents a pound. There are one or two copper mines in the United States, for instance the copper mine in my State, the Nevada Consolidated, which I believe can produce copper at 9 cents a pound. I think the Utah Copper Co. can produce copper at 9 cents a pound. I know the Anaconda Copper Co., one of the largest in the United States, can not produce it below 13 cents a pound, and they are trying to produce copper to sell at 5½ cents a pound, so they can keep running.

What good will it do? First let us see what happened. Since the last tariff act there have been opened up in Africa copper deposits that the world never dreamed of. It has three times as much copper metal in a ton of rock as any ore we have in the United States. It is cheaply worked because it is found in enormous bodies that may be easily quarried. The labor there receives from 10 to 20 cents a day, which is practically the cost of food; and, of course, it is native labor. According to the reports of the companies themselves, they can lay copper down in New York and Boston at a profit for 6 cents a pound.

But it is said they have not imported much copper into this country. The importations have practically doubled in the last year. Measuring them, however, by value in dollars they do not mean much, but measuring them in tons they mean a great deal. When copper was imported into this country at 23 cents a pound, it seemed as if a tremendous volume was coming in; but when it is imported at 6 cents a pound, it means many pounds of copper without much increase in value.

Mind you, Mr. President, the copper companies of this country have an enormous surplus of copper on hand. Every time they start to dispose of that copper they are met by a bid from the African copper companies, which can underbid the American companies no matter the price they may offer. Practically all that these companies have asked is an opportunity to run on a 20 per cent basis without shutting down and to dispose gradually of their surplus copper at cost of production instead of at half the cost of production. If they have to dispose of it at half the cost of production, the stockholders will say, "Shut down; we can not afford to lose that much; we will wait for two years and get cost of production instead of half cost of production." That was the situation. Here was a great industry, in which hundreds of thousands of men are engaged, whose taxable property contributes largely to the support of many States and helps to maintain the credit of their bonds and other securities, and who constitute in some States half of the gainfully employed labor. So copper is a major industry, affecting economically and physically the people of many large States. I thought, therefore, that the question of a tariff on copper should come up for consideration in an emergency of this kind; I insisted that action should be taken; and I voted for it.

I have regretted that during this debate pride of authorship and pride of opinion have gone so far as to cause Senators to reflect upon the sincerity of each other, to question their motives, and in some cases to charge that anyone who might vote for this or for that amendment was unpatriotic. As a matter of fact, I do not think there is an inconsistent Senator in this body, and I know that there is no unpatriotic Senator in this body. I think the Senators who used those words of vituperation and criticism will be very glad in the future to apologize for them and to withdraw them.

Mr. President, I have indicated those industries which I call major industries and which are suffering in so extraordinary a manner that they threaten bankruptcy to bankers and business and further unemployment. As to those industries I think there is an emergency.

I have heretofore supported a duty on manganese and have voted for it. The arguments made at the time of the passage of the tariff bill justified my belief that it was entitled to come within the system of high protective tariffs for which that bill provided and which now prevail in this country. I do not want any discrimination against any industry. Whether that industry is engaged in the production of raw materials or manufactured materials, the same rule of justice should apply; the same principle should apply. I feel that the change of conditions in the world, the cessation of trade and commerce, is going to necessitate in the near future an entire revision not only of tariffs but of economics, exchange, monetary systems, and financial relations. We have no time to do that now and we are not prepared to do it now.

So far as this amendment with regard to manganese is concerned, I am not so thoroughly advised concerning it as is my colleague, the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE]; he has made a particular study of it and the necessity for a duty which may exist; but I can not bring it within the classification that I have indicated of the major industries, whose destruction will bring destruction on the whole country. I am willing at any time to consider, on a tariff measure, the question of imposing a duty on manganese or on a thousand other items; but, to my mind, we have acted on the only major items that have been brought before the House committee and before the Senate committee. Even before I ever thought of supporting a duty on copper in this body I conferred with members of the House committee. I knew that they had taken a vote on it in the House committee and were unanimous in favor of a duty on copper, with the exception of one member.

The only reason they did not impose the duty in the House at that time was because they had not worked out the compensatory duties. After they had worked out compensatory duties which were satisfactory to the manufacturers, then the bill had passed the stage where such an amendment could be offered in the House; but it was presented and incorporated in the bill by the Finance Committee of the Senate. I supported it, and I think I was right in supporting it. I can not, however, bring manganese within the scope of the industries of the description and character I have mentioned, which require emergency legislation by way of the imposition of a duty.

Some of the other commodities, including copper, were on the free list; but manganese is now on the dutiable list. Whether the duty should be raised or not I do not know, but I can not vote for a duty on manganese or other tariff items of the same character to be attached to this bill. In fighting against the elimination of the copper duty from this bill, I must maintain the principle I have asserted.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I think manganese comes within an entirely distinct category of its own. Until the last few years there was no manganese produced in the United States, although there were some low-grade manganese ore bodies here. The Congress of the United States about four years ago took notice of the necessity of developing a method for making it possible to utilize the low-grade manganiferous ores, and appropriated $25,000 to be used by the Bureau of Mines for the purpose of developing a process to accomplish that result. Such a process has been developed at the University of Missouri. That action was taken at that time particularly on account of the urgent plea of the War Department, which found it necessary that we should have a domestic production of manganese in order not to have to continue to depend upon foreign governments for a supply of that commodity. Incidentally the development of the low-grade ores has, to some extent, helped some communities in the United States.

To show the necessity of having a domestic supply of manganese I need only to bring to the attention of the Senate the fact that France has no manganiferous ores and does not produce any manganese. She does produce, however, about 10,000,000 tons of steel a year and must buy her manganese abroad. The United States produces about 50,000,000 tons of steel a year. In spite of the fact that we produce five times more steel than France, the French purchases of manganese abroad have far exceeded those of the United States, showing that France is storing up manganese in view of a possible national emergency. In case the United States should be confronted with such an emergency, it would be within the possibilities that foreign supplies might not continue to be available to us, and we could not have manganese shipped in here. On that account the Congress appropriated the sum that I mentioned, and a method for the development of these ores has been found.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator is in error, if I properly interpret his remarks, when he states that only within the past few years had Congress taken cognizance of this matter.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. According to my knowledge, that is so.

Mr. KING. The Senator will recall, if he will think for a moment, that when the Fordney-McCumber bill was under consideration representatives of the so-called manganese industry appeared before the committee of the Senate, and I think before the Ways and Means Committee of the House, and represented that, though they had but limited production—indeed, it was insignificant—they believed, if Congress would give them a tariff of 1 cent that they would develop an industry. They only wanted two or three years, and promised that within the period specified—I may be inaccurate as to the limit of time, but I am sure that it was within four or five years—they would produce all the manganese that was required by the industries of the United States. Congress acceded to their wishes and gave them the tariff that was requested, as I now recall.

When the Smoot-Hawley bill was under consideration I happened to be one of the subcommittee of three, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] and the Senator from New Jersey, Mr. Edge, now our Ambassador to France, constituting the other members of the subcommittee. The representatives of the so-called manganese industry appeared and confessed that they had not developed the manganese industry in the United States to satisfy the needs of the country; indeed, they had made but very little progress during the period following the imposition of the tariff. We were very sympathetic to the pleas which were made and went into the question with the utmost care. After listening to them and to other witnesses who appeared, including one or two geologists of standing who submitted their report, the committee was unanimous of the view that no additional tariff should be granted.

As I say, I was extremely sympathetic to the proposition, because some of my own constituents were urging an increased tariff upon manganese, claiming that it would be a very great benefit to the State of Utah; but I felt constrained, in view of the testimony, to vote against any increase in the tariff. I believed then, as I believe now, that there is not sufficient production to meet the demands of the steel industry and such other demands as are made in the United States. I think it would be a tax upon industry to grant the tariff at the present time, without any corresponding benefits. It would, of course, increase the price of manganese to the steel industry, and there would be no corresponding benefits.

Moreover——

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. Just let me complete the sentence. I am trespassing upon the Senator's time. Moreover, at this particular juncture, just as stated by the able Senator from Nevada, I should feel that it was a most inopportune time to raise the question of the advantage or necessity of a tariff upon manganese.

I thank the Senator for the interruption which he has permitted.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I will yield the floor in a second. I am informed that the adoption of this amendment would increase the price of steel 60 cents a ton, and would increase the price of the steel in an automobile about 10 cents.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, in the last few years the processes for treating manganese ores have been developed to a very marked extent. These processes were comparatively unknown a very few years ago. To-day, if given the opportunity and necessary protection, the American manganese industry will develop to a point where it can supply the needs of the United States.

In debates heretofore the importance of manganese to agriculture has been brought out very clearly. It has been shown that the yield of certain agricultural crops is increased to a large extent by the use of manganese as fertilizer. I shall not go into that question now. I ask that we have a vote on this question, and I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have already submitted an amendment intended to cover the difference in the value of currency of other countries and our own. My colleague on the committee, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], has also introduced an amendment on the same subject.

I have made some corrections in my amendment, and I desire the opportunity, out of order, to offer and have printed an amendment covering those corrections.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be received and printed.

The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE], on which he requests the yeas and nays. Is the request seconded?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Hull	Robinson, Ind.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE], on which he asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). As heretofore announced, I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], who, I understand, would vote "yea" if present, while the Senator from Virginia would vote "nay." I am at liberty to vote and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], who is detained from the Senate by illness. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. WATSON. I transfer my pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BYRNES. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW] and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. LOGAN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania. I do not know how he would vote on this question and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] is necessarily absent. He is paired on this question with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]. If the Senator from Colorado were present, he would vote "yea," and I understand that the Senator from Alabama, if present, would vote "nay."

I also desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG];

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY]; and

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] with the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL].

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are detained on official business.

I also wish to announce that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. BULOW] are necessarily out of the city.

Mr. LOGAN. I find that I can transfer my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS] to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. I do so, and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 53, as follows:

So Mr. ODDIE'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I want to say now what I had not an opportunity to say before the vote was taken, that in the consideration of an ordinary tariff bill I would have voted to impose a just and reasonable tariff upon manganese upon the theory that it is infinitely more entitled to protection than any one of the articles which have been placed in the revenue bill, and very much more entitled to protection than scores of articles which are found in the existing tariff law.

Having taken the position that, from my point of view, it was indefensible to put any tariff items upon this revenue bill, I have voted against this tariff. The only beneficiary of free trade in manganese, or trade under existing circumstances in manganese, is the United States Steel Corporation.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD numerous editorials, one from the Minneapolis Journal entitled "The Tariff Lunacy at Washington," another from the New York Journal of Commerce, and editorials from several other papers dealing with the placing of tariff items in the revenue bill.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE TARIFF LUNACY AT WASHINGTON—A CALL FOR THE PRESIDENT TO SUMMON THE SENATE BACK TO ITS PARAMOUNT DUTY OF BALANCING THE BUDGET

The prime present need of the United States to-day is to balance its Budget. Restoration of business confidence waits upon restoration of confidence in the financial status of the Government itself. Until Congress achieves Budget balancing, through a combination of increased taxes and reduced outgo, every other attack upon unemployment and business depression is crippled, if not frustrated. Every day of delay means not only a loss of $7,000,000 to the United States Treasury but also 24 more hours of needless prostration.

There are now pending in Congress measures that promise to meet this urgent and immediate need. But the stubborness of powerful Senate logrollers may force these measures to travel through the labyrinth of an endless tariff controversy before they finally become law. Months and months may pass, with the deficit increasing at the rate of seven millions a day, with business and employment hopelessly marking time, before such a battle ends.

This tariff battle has been precipitated by the Senators of the oil States, the lumber States, the coal States, and the copper States. Joining forces to squeeze into a revenue-producing measure tariff rates that are frankly protective and promise a decrease in revenue instead of an increase, these Senators have brought the present session to a welter of filibustering, endless delay, senseless conflict.

The result may be a deferment of Budget balancing until next fall, or even an abandonment of all hope of Budget balancing, and a slide toward the swamp of governmental insolvency with disastrous inflationary measures urged as the remedy.

The way out of all this confusion, of course, is to divorce tariff tinkering entirely from the Budget balancing—to drop the four controversial tariff rates out of the revenue bill, and thus clear the track for that bill's speedy passage; to formulate an agreement by which both friends and foes of protection will agree that the need for prompt restoration of Federal solvency transcends any possible need for either higher or lower tariff rates.

REED SMOOT, as chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, is something more than just the representative of Utah, a copper State. JAMES WATSON, as Republican floor leader in the Senate, is something more than just the spokesman of a party faction that believes in high protection. These men are the guardians of the Republican Party's prestige and repute out over the land. Upon the way they exercise these powers of stewardship largely depends their party's fate at the polls next November. When they permit their stubbornness to threaten the wreck of all the painfully worked out plans to pull the Treasury from the shadow of bankruptcy, they tempt the lightning and dare the hurricane.

"I best serve my district when I serve my country."

The words are those of Representative CHARLES R. CRISP, Democratic acting chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee. We commend them to the attention of the Republican chairman of the Senate Finance Committee and all his Republican and Democratic allies in the oil-lumber-coal-copper coalition.

In times like these, "Times that try men's souls," the prompt balancing of the Federal Budget is tremendously more important—even to the people of the oil States, the lumber States, the coal States, and the copper States—than any conceivable increase in the protection accorded to their products. The welfare of the Nation, as in time of war, far transcends the welfare of any industry in any State.

If higher tariff rates on any of these four basic commodities are warranted, let the measure to effectuate them be introduced into Congress by itself and on its own merits. Meanwhile, let the desperately needed revenue bill travel to prompt passage on its own merits.

President Hoover has lately, with signal success, adopted the methods of Roosevelt and Wilson, in demanding that Congress act for the welfare of the Nation, and in appealing to the people themselves for the supporting pressure needed to make Congress act for the welfare of the Nation.

The time has come for the President to speak once more. His whole program of economic salvation is threatened by this tariff impasse.

Let him speak now, vigorously and emphatically, in insistence that the controversial tariff rates be dropped from the revenue bill.

Let him carry to the people themselves a determined fight to rescue his program from the menace of a long battle over tariff revision.

He has already forced Congress, somewhat against its will, to set about the task of balancing the Budget. The time is here when, by the same means, he should force Congress to complete that task.

[From the New York Journal of Commerce, May 23, 1932]

TARIFF EMBROILMENTS

When the House passed a revenue bill carrying import duties on coal and oil, unostentatiously and misleadingly entered under the heading, "excise taxes on certain articles," it was evident that trouble and delay in passage of the tax bill would arise in the Senate unless the Finance Committee deleted these items. Various Senators, Republican and Democratic, urged omission of the duties on imported oil and coal, knowing full well that their retention would release a flood of tariff amendments whose proponents felt they had equally good reason to urge increased protection for their favorite industries.

Even Senator SMOOT seemed disposed for a time to remove the House duties from their incongruous setting, but in the end unwise counsels prevailed. The Finance Committee first decided to drop all tariff items; then it reversed itself, reinstated the coal and oil duties, and added a few others. The result is that the expected has happened and the country is witnessing the disheartening spectacle presented by the logrolling, time-consuming, and selfish maneuvering that is inseparable from discussion of all kinds of tariff measures.

[From the Washington Star, May 21, 1932]

TARIFF AND REVENUE

Supporters of tariff duties on oil, coal, lumber, and copper have seized opportunity by the forelock. With the whole country demanding the enactment of a revenue bill designed to balance the Government's Budget, a coalition of Members of the Senate—following in the footsteps of a similar coalition in the House—has forced these tariff items into the revenue bill. During the consideration of the Smoot-Hawley tariff bill, now the law, proposals to levy duties on oil imported into this country were defeated, as well as proposals to levy duties now carried in the revenue bill on coal, copper, and lumber. Since the passage of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act the Democrats have won to almost equality in numbers in the Senate with the Republicans. Eighteen Democratic Senators, as a matter of fact, were recorded yesterday as voting to sustain the tax on imports of oil. Twenty-five Republicans voted for the tax, while 20 Democrats, 16 Republicans, and 1 Farmer-Laborite voted against it. Obviously party lines on the tariff have been smashed.

Supporters of the tariff amendments to the revenue bill give as a reason for imposing these import taxes the depressed conditions of the oil, coal, lumber, and copper industries. They, however, are not the only depressed industries in this country, many of which could demand further tariff protection for the same reason. It has been obvious for weeks that without a coalition of the supporters of the taxes on imported coal, oil, copper, and lumber the adoption of any one of them would be impossible. In the House supporters of the oil and coal taxes alone were sufficient to put tariff taxes on those commodities into the bill. When the bill reached the Senate, however, it became necessary to add to the list of interests to be protected. Lumber and copper were brought in, and with them the votes of several Democratic Senators from States producing those commodities.

Opponents of these protective taxes shout to the housetops that their advocates have taken advantage of the people in their need. The supporters of the taxes reply that these industries they now propose to protect from foreign competition are as worthy of protection as the steel and automobile industries. Under the theory of the protective tariff perhaps they are right, except in so far as the proponents of the protective system have opposed levying tariff duties on imports of raw materials except for revenue purposes. It has been rather clearly demonstrated that the tariff taxes on oil, coal, copper, and lumber will raise little, if any, revenue, but will act as embargoes. Their opponents insist that the result will be to increase the prices paid by the American people for coal and oil, for copper and lumber.

Politically, inclusion of these tariff taxes in the revenue bill may have a far-reaching effect. Democratic leaders have indicated that they intend to make the Republican protective tariff a major issue in the coming campaign. The record which the House and Senate Democrats have recently written in connection with the oil and coal tariff taxes will make it difficult, however, for the Democrats to bear down heavily on the Republicans on this issue. On the other hand, the Republicans in a clash with the Democrats over the tariff issue have usually won at the polls, and perhaps the willingness of the Democrats to support protective tariffs may react favorably in the interest of the Democratic Party next November. This would be a strange quirk of political fortune, if it happened.

An unfortunate circumstance attached to the fight over the tariff taxes in the revenue bill is the delay it is causing. Prompt passage of a revenue measure capable of raising sufficient income to balance the Budget and maintain the financial credit of the Government is imperative.

HARRISON RAPS TARIFF FIGHT

Inclusion of tariff duties was blamed in a radio speech last night by Senator HARRISON, Democrat of Mississippi, for the embroiled situation now confronting the Senate over the tax bill.

While the measure contains obnoxious taxes, it was framed in a spirit of nonpartisan compromise and should be enacted promptly to end business uncertainties, HARRISON said.

HARRISON denounced lobbyists, who, he said, are attempting to wreck the bill to satisfy selfish interests. He declared:

"For three days now the bill has been held up because of tariff discussions, and there is now created in the Senate an ugly situation, the repercussions of which it is feared may be reflected in the votes upon other items, important in character, which are to be considered when the tariff items are finally out of the way."

[From the Chicago Tribune, May 22, 1932]

FOUR NEW TARIFFS

The Finance Committee of the Senate has included four tariffs in the proposed tax bill, which are now being debated on the floor of the Senate. None of them will yield enough revenue to justify a moment's consideration as tax-raising measures. The proposed duties on petroleum, lumber, copper, and coal are intended solely for the purpose of preventing imports of these items.

It is a striking fact in connection with each of these commodities that the United States is normally an exporting Nation. That being so, it can hardly be maintained that American costs of production are markedly higher than those of foreign nations and that, therefore, the American market must be protected from cheap foreign labor. Nor can it be successfully maintained that the American market to-day, because of extraordinary business conditions, is being flooded with these products from abroad. It would be hard to find four commodities of which we import a smaller percentage in relation to the whole consumption in this country.

These tariffs have been written into the committee's bill as a result of successful logrolling by special interests. They hope—and even the hope is not well founded—that they can increase the price of their goods in this country if the threat of potential foreign competition is removed. They seem not to realize that the depression in the prices of their commodities is the consequence of slack demand and that the imposition of tariffs can hardly serve to increase demand. If anything, it may be expected to decrease it somewhat.

The exports of the United States in 1931, a year of profound depression, were in excess of $2,300,000,000. These exports were paid for by foreigners in part in gold, in part in services, but chiefly in goods which we imported. As the United States shuts its gates to imports it automatically shuts off a part of its market for exports.

In 1930 the United States imported only 675,000 tons of hard coal and 241,000 tons of soft coal, a wholly negligible proportion of our total consumption of 700,000,000 tons, but enough to create a few million dollars of purchasing power for American commodities abroad. It may be argued that the gain or loss of those few millions of exports can mean little to the American people, and that would be true were it not for the virtual certainty that any new tariffs written into our schedules will result in retaliatory tariffs abroad against our exports.

Certainly none of the Illinois delegation has any interest in these proposed tariffs. Illinois is one of the great exporting States of the Union. Only four other States have a larger stake in foreign trade. In the good year of 1929 the exports from Illinois had a value of $238,000,000. Even in 1931 Illinois' exports were valued at more than $140,000,000. The three leading items in the State's export list were tractors, lard, and wheat. The farmers and factory workers of Illinois stand to lose upward of $75,000,000 a year of income if our export trade is cut off. Even if every ton of coal which is now imported were to be mined in Illinois (and next to none of it would be) and every drop of oil which is imported were to be drawn instead from Illinois wells (and that is also an absurd assumption), Illinois might well lose more from these tariffs and the inevitable retaliations than this State can conceivably gain from the new duties.

The position of Illinois in this matter is typical of that of all the States of this region. Indiana, Iowa, Missouri, and Kansas, for example, each exported anywhere from ten to thirty million dollars' worth of their products.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Part III.—Stamp taxes," on page 271, line 12, after the figure "10," to strike out "cents" " and insert "cents", and by inserting at the end thereof a new sentence to read as follows: "The tax under this subdivision shall not apply to any instrument under the terms of which the obligee is required to make payment therefor in installments and is not permitted to make in any year a payment of more than 20 per cent of the cash amount to which entitled upon maturity of the instrument," so as to read:

SEC. 721. STAMP TAX ON ISSUES OF BONDS, ETC.

(a) Subdivision 1 of Schedule A of Title VIII of the revenue act of 1926 is amended by striking out "5 cents" and inserting in lieu thereof "10 cents," and by inserting at the end thereof a new sentence to read as follows: "The tax under this subdivision shall not apply to any instrument under the terms of which the obligee is required to make payment therefor in installments and is not permitted to make in any year a payment of more than 20 per cent of the cash amount to which entitled upon maturity of the instrument."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 272, line 15, after the word "thereof" to insert: "of the certificates issued by such corporation or by such investment trust or similar organization (or of the shares where no certificates were issued)," so as to read:

SEC. 722. STAMP TAX ON ISSUES OF STOCK, ETC.

(a) Subdivision 2 of Schedule A of Title VIII of the revenue act of 1926 is amended to read as follows:

"2. Capital stock (and similar interests), issue: On each original issue, whether on organization or reorganization, of shares or certificates of stock, or of profits, or of interest in property or accumulations, by any corporation, or by any investment trust or similar organization (or by any person on behalf of such investment trust or similar organization) holding or dealing in any of the instruments mentioned or described in this subdivision or subdivision 1 (whether or not such investment trust or similar organization constitutes a corporation within the meaning of this act), on each $100 of par or face value or fraction thereof of the certificates issued by such corporation or by such investment trust or similar organization (or of the shares where no certificates were issued), 10 cents."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 272, line 24, after the word "thereof," to insert "of such certificates (or of the shares where no certificates were issued)," and on page 273, line 2, after the word "fraction," to strike out "thereof" and insert "thereof, of such certificates (or of the shares where no certificates were issued)," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That where such shares or certificates are issued without par or face value, the tax shall be 10 cents per share (corporate share, or investment trust or other organization share, as the case may be), unless the actual value is in excess of $100 per share, in which case the tax shall be 10 cents on each $100 of actual value or fraction thereof of such certificates (or of the shares where no certificates were issued), or unless the actual value is less than $100 per share, in which case the tax shall be 2 cents on each $20 of actual value, or fraction thereof, of such certificates (or of the shares where no certificates were issued).

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 274, line 7, after the word "thereof," to insert "of the certificates of such corporation or other organization (or of the shares where no certificates were issued)," so as to read:

SEC. 723. STAMP TAX ON TRANSFER OF STOCK, ETC.

(a) Subdivision 3 of Schedule A of Title VIII of the revenue act of 1926 is amended to read as follows:

"3. Capital stock (and similar interests), sales or transfers: On all sales, or agreements to sell, or memoranda of sales or deliveries of, or transfers of legal title to any of the shares or certificates mentioned or described in subdivision 2, or to rights to subscribe for or to receive such shares or certificates, whether made upon or shown by the books of the corporation or other organization, or by any assignment in blank, or by any delivery, or by any paper or agreement or memorandum or other evidence of transfer or sale (whether entitling the holder in any manner to the benefit of such share, certificate, interest, or rights, or not), on each $100 of par or face value or fraction thereof of the certificates of such corporation or other organization (or of the shares where no certificates were issued), 4 cents, and where such shares or certificates are without par or face value, the tax shall be 4 cents on the transfer or sale or agreement to sell on each share (corporate share, or investment trust or other organization share, as the case may be)."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 274, line 14, after the word "That," to strike out "in no case shall the tax imposed by this subdivision be less than one-fourth of 1 per cent of the selling price, if any, of such shares, certificates, or rights: Provided further, That," and in line 21, after the word "so," to strike out "deposited" and insert "deposited, nor upon mere loans of stock," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That it is not intended by this title to impose a tax upon an agreement evidencing a deposit of certificates as collateral security for money loaned thereon, which certificates are not actually sold, nor upon the delivery or transfer for such purpose of certificates so deposited, nor upon mere loans of stock, nor upon the return of stock so loaned.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 275, line 3, after the word "facts," to insert a colon and the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That the tax shall not be imposed upon deliveries or transfers from a fiduciary to a nominee of such fiduciary, or from one nominee of such fiduciary to another, if such shares or certificates continue to be held by such nominee for the same purpose for which they would be held if retained by such fiduciary, or from the nominee to such fiduciary, but such deliveries or transfers shall be accompanied by a certificate setting forth the facts.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the Senate is about to consider an amendment in which several Senators who are not at the present time in the Chamber are interested. I am rather under the impression that several Senators had asked that they be notified when we reached some amendments which have just been agreed to, but I do not expect the Senate to suspend while they are coming, and I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will not the Senator just let the pending amendment be passed over and allow us to take up the next item and we can recur to this?

Mr. BLAINE. I do not want the issue confused. Senators desire to be present when this section is taken up and may ask to have reconsidered the votes by which the amendments just agreed to were passed. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Couzens	Hull	Schall
Bailey	Cutting	Johnson	Sheppard
Bankhead	Dale	Jones	Shipstead
Barbour	Davis	Kean	Shortridge
Barkley	Dickinson	Keyes	Smoot
Bingham	Dill	King	Steiwer
Blaine	Fess	La Follette	Stephens
Borah	Fletcher	Logan	Thomas, Idaho
Bratton	Frazier	McGill	Thomas, Okla.
Broussard	George	McNary	Townsend
Bulkley	Glass	Metcalf	Trammell
Byrnes	Gore	Moses	Tydings
Capper	Hale	Norris	Vandenberg
Caraway	Harrison	Nye	Wagner
Carey	Hastings	Oddie	Walsh, Mass.
Cohen	Hatfield	Patterson	Walsh, Mont.
Connally	Hawes	Pittman	Watson
Coolidge	Hayden	Reed	Wheeler
Copeland	Hebert	Robinson, Ark.	White
Costigan	Howell	Robinson, Ind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Seventy-nine Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the votes by which the amendments on page 274 were agreed to be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator wish to enter a motion or does he want to make the motion now?

Mr. BLAINE. I ask unanimous consent that the votes by which the amendments were agreed to be reconsidered. Then I shall ask that the entire section go over until the Senator from Washington can be present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator asks unanimous consent to reconsider, awaiting the presence of the Senator from Washington. May the Chair suggest that if the Senator will enter a motion to reconsider, the motion can be made at any time by the Senator from Washington when he is present?

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing that unanimous consent be granted, if the Senator insists upon it. There is no reason whatever for trying to stop discussion of the amendments, other than to save time. I have no objection.

Mr. BLAINE. I appreciate what the Senator says. I ask unanimous consent for the reconsideration of the votes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the votes by which the amendments on page 274 were agreed to are reconsidered, and the Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that action upon the three amendments be deferred.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask that action on all amendments to section 723 be deferred for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be entered.

The Senator from Wisconsin means the amendments in section 723 which have thus far been agreed to, because we are now considering an amendment on page 275 in the same section.

Mr. BLAINE. I was asking that the consideration of the whole section be deferred.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean section 722 and section 723?

Mr. BLAINE. No; section 723, relating to stamp tax, transfers of stock, and so forth.

I was asking that consideration of the whole question go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean section 722 or section 723?

Mr. BLAINE. Section 723, relating to the stamp tax on transfer of stocks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the request of the Senator from Wisconsin to be that reconsideration be had of the votes thus far taken on the amendments adopted to section 723 and that all action upon section 723 be passed over. Is that correct?

Mr. BLAINE. That is correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, on page 278, line 8, after the figure "1," to insert "and of a kind the issue of which is taxable thereunder," and, in line 14, after the word "thereof," to strike out "2 cents" and insert "4 cents," so as to read:

SEC. 724. STAMP TAX ON TRANSFER OF BONDS, ETC.

(a) Schedule A of Title VIII of the revenue act of 1926 is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subdivision to read as follows:

"9. Bonds, etc., sales or transfers: On all sales, or agreements to sell, or memoranda of sales or deliveries of, or transfers of legal title to any of the instruments mentioned or described in subdivision 1 and of a kind the issue of which is taxable thereunder, whether made by any assignment in blank or by any delivery, or by any paper or agreement or memorandum or other evidence of transfer or sale (whether entitling the holder in any manner to the benefit of such instrument or not), on each $100 of face value or fraction thereof, 4 cents."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, section 724 relates to the same subject matter. I think consideration of that section should go hand in hand with the consideration of section 723, and therefore I ask unanimous consent that consideration of section 724 go over.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for reconsideration of the vote by which the amendments just agreed to were adopted and also asks unanimous consent in that connection that consideration of section 724 be passed over. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have no objection; but I am quite sure the Senator from Wisconsin will allow us to make a mere verbal correction in the wording of the section. On page 278, line 25, strike out the words "the entire amount" and insert the words "any of the," so it will read "if any of the gain or loss," and so forth. It is a mere correction of the wording.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin modify his unanimous-consent request to that extent?

Mr. BLAINE. That is perfectly satisfactory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the unanimous-consent request is entered into, with the exception of the amendment stated by the Senator from Utah, which, without objection, is agreed to, and all further consideration of section 724 is passed over. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, on page 280, line 24, after the figures "1934," to insert "(unless deposited in escrow before April 1, 1932)," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 725. STAMP TAX ON CONVEYANCES

Schedule A of Title VIII of the revenue act of 1926 is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subdivision to read as follows:

"8. Conveyances: Deed, instrument, or writing, delivered on or after the 15th day after the date of the enactment of the revenue act of 1932 and before July 1, 1934 (unless deposited in escrow before April 1, 1932), whereby any lands, tenements, or other realty sold shall be granted, assigned, transferred, or otherwise conveyed to or vested in the purchaser or purchasers, or any other person or persons, by his, her, or their direction, when the consideration or value of the interest or property conveyed, exclusive of the value of any lien or encumbrance remaining thereon at the time of sale exceeds $100 and does not exceed $500, 50 cents, and for each additional $500 or fractional part thereof 50 cents. This subdivision shall not apply to any instrument or writing given to secure a debt."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 281, after line 9, to strike out:

SEC. 726. STAMP TAX ON SALES OF PRODUCE FOR FUTURE DELIVERY

(a) Subdivision 4 of Schedule A of Title VIII of the revenue act of 1926 is amended by striking out "1 cent" wherever appearing in such subdivision and inserting in lieu thereof "5 cents."

(b) Subsection (a) shall take effect on the fifteenth day after the date of the enactment of this act.

(c) Effective July 1, 1934, such subdivision 4, as amended by subsection (a) of this section, is amended by striking out "5 cents" wherever appearing in such subdivision and inserting in lieu thereof "1 cent."

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I would like to have the chairman of the committee give a brief explanation of the reason for striking out that provision.

Mr. SMOOT. This has reference to dealing on the stock market in farm products.

Mr. FRAZIER. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator object to striking it out?

Mr. FRAZIER. I want to know the reason why it was stricken out.

Mr. HARRISON. There were several witnesses who appeared here on this matter. One of them was Mr. T. R. Keane, representative of the grain committee of Jacksonville, Ill. He said that he lived on a farm and appeared before us as president of the Illinois Grain Dealers' Association and as president of the National Grain Dealers' Association. He opposed this provision very much.

Mr. SMOOT. The present law provides 1 cent. The House provision increased it from 1 cent to 5 cents. The farm organizations of the country protested against it, so we struck it out and left it as it is.

Mr. FRAZIER. The farm organizations protested?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and it was done at their request. In other words, the tax was increased from 1 cent to 5 cents, and we strike it out and leave it as it was.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I would like to give notice of my intention to move to reconsider that vote, so I may have a chance to look up the matter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion will be entered, and the clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 281, line 25, after the word "of," to strike out "oil" and insert "crude petroleum and liquid products thereof," so as to read:

PART IV—TAX ON TRANSPORTATION OF OIL BY PIPE LINE

SEC. 731. TAX ON TRANSPORTATION OF OIL BY PIPE LINE

(a) There is hereby imposed upon all transportation of crude petroleum and liquid products thereof by pipe line originating on or after the fifteenth day after the date of the enactment of this act and before July 1, 1934—

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I may be out of the Chamber when the amendment on page 286 comes up. In order to save time may I ask the Senator from Utah if he will look at page 286 for a moment, that has to do with the tax on checks? In section (b), page 286, line 11, it is provided that such taxes shall be payable "to the collector of the district in which his principal place of business is located, or if he has no principal place of business in the United States, to the collector at Baltimore, Md."

Mr. SMOOT. That appears in all of the tax provisions.

Mr. TYDINGS. I can see some necessity for a provision of that kind, but I was wondering how Baltimore, Md., happened to be selected.

Mr. SMOOT. Outside of the District of Columbia, Baltimore is the nearest collector's office, and perhaps more taxpayers who have no residence at all in any of the States pay their taxes there than at any other office.

Mr. TYDINGS. I was not objecting, but I wanted the information.

Mr. HARRISON. Is it not also because of the fact that there is no collector here and the nearest place is Baltimore?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that is true.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, on page 282, line 3, after the word "to," to strike out "8 per cent" and insert "3 per cent," and in line 6, after the word "person," to strike out "paying for such transportation and to be collected by the person," so as to read:

(1) A tax equivalent to 3 per cent of the amount paid on or after the 15th day after the date of the enactment of this act for such transportation, to be paid by the person furnishing such transportation.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I have no objection to the amendment, but I do think we are entitled to an explanation as to why 8 per cent was stricken out and 3 per cent inserted, and why lines 6 and 7 were stricken out. I do not like to vote on these amendments without having some information.

Mr. SMOOT. It merely makes it easier as a matter of administration in the collection of the tax.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Can the Senator tell me how much revenue will be collected under the House provision and under the amendment proposed by the Finance Committee?

Mr. HARRISON. Under the House provision probably $20,000,000, and under the provision adopted by the Senate Finance Committee it will bring in only $6,000,000.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What is the purpose of the change?

Mr. HARRISON. Because some of us were outvoted in the committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then, let us outvote the committee.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, of course the Senator from Mississippi puts that in rather an epigrammatic way, but perhaps with as much emphasis as accuracy. The point was that this tax would be shifted back. Originally it was placed on the shipper of crude petroleum through the pipe lines and imposed on the shipper in express terms. It was universally recognized that the tax would be shifted back on the producer of oil, the price of which is sometimes fixed by the larger concerns—sometimes referred to as a monopoly, I may say. They fix the price from time to time. It was thought that they could reduce the price of crude oil sufficiently to cover the cost of the transportation, and not only that much but to reimburse themselves entirely for this transportation tax.

It is generally known, whatever Senators' attitude touching a tariff on oil may be, that the oil industry is a stricken industry, not only suffering from the general depression, but suffering from a depression peculiar to the oil industry. It was in the depths of a depression before the general depression began. It was staggering then. It was an invalid industry then. It was felt that an 8 per cent tax was too heavy to bear. For that reason it was reduced to 3 per cent and it was imposed on the pipe-line companies rather than on the shipper; the House made it expressly collectible from the shipper of oil. I think it is necessary to the rescue of the industry.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I inquire whether the pipe lines are not almost entirely owned by the large oil companies?

Mr. GORE. They are. For that matter, it is rather a nominal transfer to impose it on the pipe-line companies rather than the shipper, because the pipe-line companies will, of course, collect it from the shipper—shift it back to the shipper of the oil.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Oklahoma or the Senator from Utah whether the charge is made against the shipper owning the pipe line?

Mr. GORE. I think it is against the company owning the pipe lines.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. In case no charge for transportation is made, then there is no tax?

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. GORE. I do not think it relates to the short pipe lines that are used for local purposes. I think those are excepted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, as I understand the situation as stated by the Senator from Mississippi there is a difference of $14,000,000 between the revenue-producing qualities of the House provision and the recommendations of the Finance Committee. It is my further understanding that the pipe lines are owned by the large oil companies. So I submit to the Senator that we ought to save that $14,000,000, sustain the action of the House, and vote down this amendment. It calls for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays are demanded. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

RELIEF OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, on yesterday an amendment to the pending tax bill was offered by the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] for the benefit and protection of agriculture. It provided for an adequate tariff on copra, oil seeds, coconut oil, and so forth. On motion of the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] it was amended so as to exclude from the operation of the proposed tariff any of the products named coming from our island possessions. Thereupon the original amendment was voted down although, in its amended form, it would have been of great advantage to the farmer.

The effect of the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota to the pending revenue bill was to exempt imports of vegetable and animal oils and fats from the Philippines into the United States from any of the excise taxes assessed by the Shipstead amendment. Practically, however, the amendment of the Senator from Missouri would have had little or no effect except with regard to coconut oil and copra, as they are the only products covered by the Shipstead amendment which are imported from the Philippines and our other possessions.

Coconut oil and copra are imported in large quantities from the Philippines. In fact, most of our imports of these commodities come from the Philippine Islands. Our farmers are entitled to protection from these products; but the elimination of the tax on those of them which come from the Philippines and our other possessions did not destroy the value of the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota. The estimated revenue from coconut oil and copra from the Philippines under the Shipstead amendment was approximately $9,000,000. The effect of the Hawes amendment would have been to reduce the revenue under the Shipstead amendment by approximately this amount. The estimated revenue from the other items in Senator SHIPSTEAD's amendment would total approximately $15,542,000. I submit a table showing the imports of the articles listed in the Shipstead amendment and showing the estimated amount of revenue under the proposed rates.

Mr. President, I ask that the table to which I have referred may be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I submit that any new source of revenue which will yield more than $15,000,000 annually is worth favorable consideration, particularly in these days when it is difficult to find new sources of revenue.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that, with the exception of whale oil, fish oil, and coconut oil, which comes mostly from the Philippine Islands, all of which now carry very low rates of duty, the articles proposed to be taxed now enter free of duty. They pay practically nothing in taxes for the support of this Government, and yet have the privilege of our markets.

EFFECT OF IMPORTS UPON AGRICULTURE

The importation of palm oil in the United States has increased from 41,948,000 pounds in 1920 to 287,492,000 pounds in 1930. It is produced chiefly in West Africa and Netherland East Indies. It has displaced the use of domestic oils and fats in the manufacture of soap. In 1912 imported palm oil represented 1 per cent of the total consumption of oils in soap making, whereas in 1929 it represented 11.4 per cent of the total consumption. In contrast with this increase in the use of palm oil for soap purposes, the use of domestic products decreased. Domestic inedible tallow in 1912 represented 32.1 per cent of the total consumption of oils for soap making, whereas in 1929 it represented only 29.1 per cent of the total consumption. Domestic cottonseed oil represented 17.8 per cent of the total consumption in 1912 and only seven-tenths of 1 per cent of the total consumption in 1929. Domestic cottonseed oil represented 12 per cent of the total consumption in 1912, but only 6.4 per cent of the total consumption in 1929. Corn oil, peanut oil, and miscellaneous oils represented 4.7 per cent of the total consumption in 1912, and only 2.5 per cent in 1929.

Palm oil is a direct competitor of tallow in the manufacture of soap. Palm oil does not yield a quick-lathering soap, such as coconut oil, consequently the arguments of the soap interests on this point are invalid when applied to palm oil. Why should we import palm oil from Africa and Netherland East Indies when we produce a surplus of tallow and oleo oil? Why should not the livestock producers of this country be given the benefit of this market for their by-products? Why should not our cotton farmers also have the privilege of this market for the lower grades of cottonseed oil and cottonseed-oil foots? Why should not the corn farmers and peanut producers likewise have the benefit of this outlet for corn oil and peanut oil, particularly the lower grades of these oils?

Palm-kernel oil, sunflower oil, sesame oil, rapeseed oil, and olive oil are all used for soap when rendered inedible. The proposed amendment would place a tax of 2 cents per pound on these oils in inedible form, which now enter free of duty. The proposed amendment would not only afford some revenue but would help to give our farmers the benefit of the domestic market, now displaced by the imports of these oils.

Sesame seed would also be taxed under this amendment. The tariff act already provides a duty of 3 cents per pound on sesame oil, but failed to provide any duty on sesame seed from which the oil is extracted. Sesame oil, when rendered inedible, however, is free of duty. Obviously it is a simple matter to bring the oil in the form of seed, thereby evading the duty, whenever the price situation warrants such a procedure. Sesame oil is suitable for use in the manufacture of margarine, salad oils, mayonnaise, lard substitutes, and soaps. About three-fourths of the imports of sesame oil are used in the manufacture of edible products and about one-fourth in the manufacture of soap.

Why should we import inedible sesame oil and allow it free entry to our markets when ample supplies of corn oil, peanut oil, cottonseed oil, and tallow are available for soap manufacture? Why should we import it or import sesame seed for oil production for the manufacture of salad oils, mayonnaise, margarine, and lard substitutes when ample quantities of domestic corn oil, peanut oil, cottonseed oil, soybean oil, and tallow are available?

The imports of whale oil, seal oil, herring oil, and pilchard oil for the manufacture of soap and edible products also displace the use not only of similar domestic products of American fisheries but tallow, lard, butter, cottonseed oil, corn oil, peanut oil, and soybean oil, produced from the products of American farms, which otherwise might be utilized.

The Shipstead amendment would have benefited either directly or indirectly a large number of farmers in the United States. The imports of duty-free oils and fats affect the markets either directly or indirectly for the products of millions of American farms.

I have before me a table compiled from information furnished by O. E. Baker, Bureau of Agricultural Economics, United States Department of Agriculture, which shows the large number of farmers who have a material interest in this question by reason of their production of oil-bearing materials. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, that this table may be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Comparative number of citizens benefited

Commodity	Number of farmers producing crop named, census of 1924
Soybeans	284,384 in Illinois, Ohio, Indiana, Iowa, Tennessee, North Carolina, Alabama, and Virginia.
Lard	4,565,000 reported hogs slaughtered on farms. 4,850,807 reported swine on farms.
Peanuts	250,847, mostly Georgia, all Southeastern States, and Arkansas.
Cottonseed	1,931,307 Southern States.
Tallow	[1] 538,593 reported sheep on farms. [1] 434,608 reported sheep and lambs slaughtered. 2,051,925 reported beef cattle on farms.
Flaxseed	104,405 reported flaxseed harvested in North Dakota, Minnesota, South Dakota, Montana, and Wisconsin.
Dairy products	2,761,911 reported dairy cattle on farms.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, the action of the Senate in rejecting this perfected amendment that would assure $15,000,000 of revenue and at the same time greatly benefit the agricultural industry is incomprehensible, in view of the fact that tariffs have been inserted for the protection of the coal, copper, petroleum, and lumber industries—tariffs that will produce little revenue, intentionally protective tariffs, not germane in connection with this bill, while the Shipstead amendment was germane.

Mr. President, why such discrimination against agriculture? Agriculture is entitled upon the floor of the Senate to the same consideration to which copper is entitled, to which coal is entitled, to which lumber is entitled, and to which oil is entitled. The industries producing those commodities have been enjoying a considerable prosperity during the last 10 years, but agriculture has been at the bottom of the economic scale.

Mr. President, we must do something for agriculture. We can not turn away from amendments for the benefit of agriculture in this manner without some excuse. There were those who seemed to think when the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] was adopted that the amendment of the latter Senator would be worth nothing to the farmer; but, Mr. President, that is not the fact. If it were adopted, it would be of great benefit to the farmer, and at the same time would produce $15,000,000 of revenue for the Treasury. What are we to say to the farmer when we return home—that the Senate did not have the will to act in his behalf; that we could aid copper, we could aid coal, we could aid oil, we could aid lumber, thus increasing the costs which the farmer has to pay for those commodities, but that we would not do anything for him, although his industry was in the depths of despond?

Mr. President, we must act for agriculture. We must do something for agriculture; agriculture must be rescued.

Now, Mr. President, I enter a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], as amended, was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska enters a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment mentioned by him was rejected.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, referring to the item that we were considering in regard to the tax on pipe lines, would it be agreeable to the Senator from Oklahoma and to those who are interested to pass this over for the present, and take no action on it at this particular time?

Mr. GORE. It would be satisfactory to me. In fact, I should like to have that course taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands the Senator from Mississppi to make that request.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I ask unanimous consent that it may be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Very well. The Senator from Mississippi asks unanimous consent that the Senate pass over section 731 in its entirety. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be entered. The clerk will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment was, on page 284, after line 11, to strike out:

PART V.—TAX ON LEASES ON SAFE-DEPOSIT BOXES

SEC. 741—TAX ON LEASES OF SAFE-DEPOSIT BOXES

(a) There is hereby imposed a tax equivalent to 10 per cent of the amount collected on or after the 15th day after the date of the enactment of this act and before July 1, 1934, for the use during such period of any safe-deposit box, such tax to be paid by the person collecting such amount.

(b) For the purposes of this section any vault, safe, box, or other receptacle, of not more than 40 cubic feet capacity, used for the safekeeping or storage of jewelry, plate, money, specie, bullion, stocks, bonds, securities, valuable papers of any kind, or other valuable personal property, shall be regarded as a safe-deposit box.

(c) Every person making any collections specified in subsection (a) shall on or before the last day of each month make a return, under oath, for the preceding month, and pay the tax imposed by subsection (a) to the collector for the district in which is located his principal place of business, or, if he has no principal place of business in the United States, then to the collector at Baltimore, Md. Such returns shall contain such information and be made in such manner as the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may by regulations prescribe.

(d) The tax shall, without assessment by the commissioner or notice from the collector, be due and payable to the collector at the time fixed for filing the return. If the tax is not paid when due, there shall be added as part of the tax interest at the rate of 1 per cent a month from the time the tax became due until paid.

(e) The provisions (including penalties) of section 1114 of the revenue act of 1926 shall be applicable with respect to the tax imposed by subsection (a).

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if there is no objection, I desire to propose certain amendments to the House text. Will I have to ask unanimous consent that the amendment of the Senate committee be rejected temporarily?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has been proceeding through the day upon the assumption that all of these amendments which have been proposed, one by one, by the Senator from Utah are committee amendments and therefore take the place of whatever is printed in the bill. Under that assumption, the Chair will hold that any amendment which the Senator now wishes to offer will be in lieu of the amendment as printed in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

On page 284, lines 16 and 17, I move to strike out "and before July 1, 1934."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. May the Chair make an inquiry? Does that include the whole matter, or is that merely a perfecting amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. Is is a perfecting amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. I have two other amendments.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry, if you please. This section is proposed to be entirely stricken out by the committee amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes. The Chair understands the Senator from Utah, however, to be offering certain perfecting amendments to the House text, with a view then to asking that the committee amendment striking out the entire paragraph be rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is that the purpose?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is, the House text will be ultimately revived, with the amendments which the Senator is now presenting?

Mr. SMOOT. That is what we hope to do, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the understanding of the Chair.

The CHIEF CLERK. Also, on page 284, line 17, it is proposed to strike out "during such period" and to insert in lieu thereof "after such date."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On the same page, lines 18 and 19, it is proposed to strike out "collecting such amount" and insert in lieu thereof "paying for the use of the safe-deposit box."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. On the same page, 285, in line 2, after the word "shall," it is proposed to insert "collect the amount of tax imposed by such subsection from the person paying for the use of the safe-deposit box, and shall."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Now, with those amendments, I ask that the wording of the House text be agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What the Senator really desires is to have the amendment of the committee rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that will be the easiest way.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee striking out Part V.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 285, after line 19, it is proposed to insert:

Part V.—Tax on checks, etc.

Mr. TYDINGS. What became of the oil amendment?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was passed over.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Utah that the next part of the bill go over?

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that that go over. I want Part V, tax on checks, and so forth, to go over.

Mr. NORRIS. Until to-morrow?

Mr. SMOOT. Until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, Part V, tax on checks, and so forth, will be passed over.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, instead of taking up these controversial propositions dealing with increased postage, the tax on checks, and so forth, I desire to ask the Senator from Utah why we can not take up the administrative changes for the rest of the afternoon?

Mr. SMOOT. That is what I intended to ask. I was going to propose that we begin now with Part VII, Administrative Provisions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What about Part VI? No action has been taken on that yet.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will not the Senator wait until we act on this next amendment before doing that? We are just down to it.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah will yield for a moment, I should like to ask him a question.

In section 23 (r), at the bottom of page 32, paragraph (3) reads as follows:

(3) This subsection shall not apply to a dealer in securities in respect of transactions in the ordinary course of his business with his customers, nor to a bank or trust company incorporated under the laws of the United States or of any State or Territory.

I am wondering if the Senator and the Senate would consent to an amendment of that section by striking out the period on line 2, page 33, and adding these words:

Nor to persons carrying on the banking business, where the receipt of deposits constitutes a substantial part of such business, in respect of transactions in the ordinary course of such banking business.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the private bankers' amendment.

Mr. TYDINGS. For example, in my State and in every State in the Union there is a concern known as Alexander Brown & Sons, the oldest banking firm in the United States. It is a partnership. Those men have not only the partnership responsibility but their own personal responsibility back of the banking business.

Mr. SMOOT. That is known as the personal provision in the limitation of stock losses, and I see no reason why it should not be agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. O Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. Just a moment; let me point this out to the Senator:

If these men were incorporated, all that would be back of their business would be the corporation. They are not incorporated, however, and all of their partnership property and their own personal property in addition thereto is back of the business. Yet we give an incorporated partnership a special preference which we will not give to a man who is willing to risk every cent he has to support the partnership; and it does seem to me that a great many of these older banking houses—and this one is over 100 years old—ought to have just as much exemption as would be given to an incorporated partnership.

For example, the partnership is liable for the debts of each of the partners and for the debts of the business; but if they are incorporated, only the corporation is liable. There is no justice in that. There is no fairness in that. You take away from the man who does business with the partnership an additional security.

I hope that the committee will consent to this amendment and that the Senate will agree to it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah has stated that he sees no reason why this amendment should not be accepted. I should like to say that if the Senate accepts this amendment it will exempt every private banker in the United States from the imposition of this tax. All the investment bankers and all the private bankers in the United States will be exempted from the imposition of this tax.

The Senator from Utah says he sees no objection to the acceptance of that amendment and says that the Treasury recommends it; but, as far as my understanding is concerned, the committee threshed out all this matter and decided that it was not in favor of exempting the private bankers from the application of this tax. If that matter is coming up, I think it should come up at a time when there is a more full attendance of the Senate, and that an amendment of that kind should not be adopted at this time of the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. May the Chair make a statement of fact?

This whole matter, beginning on line 8 of page 32 and going over into the second line of page 33, was passed over at the request of the present occupant of the chair, who was acting not only in his own behalf but in behalf of the Senator from Rhode Island. The Chair feels certain that neither the Senator from Rhode Island nor himself would like to have the matter taken up unless there is a full attendance of the Senate.

Mr. TYDINGS. Under the circumstances, then, I will ask that it go over. It was my thought when I rose that perhaps here was something we could get out of the way without any great amount of debate; but, in view of what the Chair has said, I withdraw the proposal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On behalf of himself and the Senator from Rhode Island, the Chair thanks the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from Wisconsin, I desire to say that the amendment provides that the majority of the business of such a bank must consist of deposits in the bank.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Why, certainly. The amendment says they must have substantial deposits; but does the Senator think he can go to any of these big private bankers in New York or Philadelphia and get them to finance or float an issue of securities without putting in a substantial deposit? All these private bankers have large deposits of funds in their custody, and the amendment will let them all in. That is the point I am making.

If the matter is going over, however, there is no use of debating it further at this time.

Mr. SMOOT. No; there is no need of discussing it any further to-night, since it is going over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment was, on page 286, after line 19, to insert:

PART VI.—TAX ON CIGARETTE PAPERS

SEC. 751. TAX ON CIGARETTE PAPERS

Section 402 of the revenue act of 1926 is amended by inserting after "importer" a comma and the following: "or removed for consumption or sale," and by striking out "more than twenty-five but."

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I desire to make a very brief statement with reference to that amendment.

In the first place, the Treasury estimates that the amount of revenue derived from it would be negligible, that it would not amount to anything, because if this one-half cent tax were put on cigarette-paper packages of less than 25 sheets the result would be that practically none of them would be made.

There has grown up in the last two or three years quite an industry in making tobacco for the use of those who, as it is said, "roll their own" cigarettes. It is a kind of tobacco that is used by the poorest people of the country, who can not afford to buy expensive cigarettes and who buy a package of this tobacco and are given a package of 25 cigarette papers which they take home with them and roll the cigarettes and smoke them. They already pay a tax of 18 cents a pound on that tobacco.

In an ordinary pound of tobacco there are about 16 packages of 1 ounce each. This tax will amount to an increase in the tax on that tobacco from 18 cents a pound to 26 cents a pound; so that it affects the poorest class of smokers in the United States, who can not afford ready-made cigarettes but who do buy this cheaper class of tobacco, and have a package of cigarette papers thrown in, in order that they may roll their own cigarettes and enjoy a smoke.

In view of the fact that no revenue is involved here to amount to anything, it seems to me that this amendment ought not to be agreed to, because it will be a hardship on the poorer class of smokers, and will, in fact, interfere with an industry that has grown up in this country of manufacturing the type of paper that goes into these free packages of cigarette paper.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HULL. Would not this amendment really reduce the consumption of these cheap, and in many instances practically worthless, grades of tobacco, so that in the end there would be more taxes lost than gained?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; I am glad the Senator has called my attention to that fact. The amount of this cheaper tobacco that is consumed will be decreased to such an extent that it will offset the revenue of 18 cents a pound now received on that tobacco, which will amount to more than the negligible amount that will be derived from the tax.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. From what little I know about this matter, I am in sympathy with what the Senator says; but I can not get any clear idea of what is proposed.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will explain the matter to the Senator.

Under the act of 1926 there is a tax of one-half cent on all cigarette-paper packages of between 25 sheets and 50 sheets. In books of above 50 sheets there is a 1-cent tax on each package. This language takes out the limitation, and puts a half cent tax on all packages of cigarette paper regardless of the number of sheets; that is, where the number is below 25. That is what it amounts to.

Mr. NORRIS. In other words, under existing law the people who make their own cigarettes enjoy a reduction in tax, and this will take it away from them?

Mr. BARKLEY. This will take it away from them. In other words, packages of cigarette paper of less than 25 sheets bear no tax; and if this amendment is agreed to, they will bear a tax of half a cent.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, under existing law cigarette papers in books of 25 or less are exempt from tax. This is to permit free distribution of such books with packages of tobacco. This privilege is being abused and the tax evaded by giving with one package of tobacco two or more books of 25 papers each. To eliminate this practice the exemption of the small books is eliminated and the tax is made applicable to withdrawals for consumption or sale as well as to sales.

That is what is being done and that is why the Treasury wanted this hole stopped up.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, this is the situation. All the cigarette papers used for ready-made cigarettes are imported. The paper is made abroad and is brought into the United States. The industry to which I have referred is an American industry, and this amendment was put into the bill at the request of the importers of foreign-made cigarette paper in order to keep out any competition in the United States. There is a large factory in Massachusetts which makes the very type of paper used in these very packages of 25 sheets and less. It is not a revenue matter. It was done simply to protect importers of foreign paper against an American industry.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. What has the Senator to say in reply to what the Senator from Utah stated, that the law is being evaded?

Mr. BARKLEY. I have here information which, if the Senate is patient enough to listen to it, will show that that is not accurate. I know an importer came before the Committee on Finance and said that the law was being evaded, but it is not being evaded.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator will admit that the importer did not say it any more than the Treasury Department has said it. I have referred to the statement of the Treasury Department.

As far as this matter is concerned, it is a very little thing—it is not worth while talking over to-night—so let us have a vote and decide it one way or the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

On a division, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which this amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be entered. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 287, to insert:

PART VII.—ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

SEC. 761. PAYMENT OF TAXES

The taxes imposed by Parts I, IV, and V of this title shall, without assessment by the commissioner or notice from the collector, be due and payable to the collector at the time fixed for filing the return. If the tax is not paid when due, there shall be added as part of the tax interest at the rate of 1 per cent a month from the time the tax became due until paid.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 287, after line 9, to insert:

SEC. 762. REFUNDS AND CREDITS

(a) Credit or refund of any overpayment of tax imposed by Part I or V of this title may be allowed to the person who collected the tax and paid it to the United States if such person establishes, to the satisfaction of the commissioner, under such regulations as the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary may prescribe, that he has repaid the amount of such tax to the person from whom he collected it, or obtained the consent of such person to the allowance of such credit or refund.

(b) Any person entitled to refund of tax under Part I, IV, or V of this title paid, or collected and paid, to the United States by him may take credit therefor against taxes due upon any monthly return.

(c) Any person making a refund of any payment on which tax under Part I has been collected may repay therewith the amount of tax collected on such payment, and the amount of tax so repaid may be credited against the tax under any subsequent return.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 288, after line 3, to insert:

SEC. 763. REGULATIONS

The commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, shall prescribe and publish all needful rules and regulations for the enforcement of Parts I, IV, and V of this title.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 288, after line 7, to insert:

SEC. 764. APPLICABILITY OF ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

All provisions of law (including penalties) applicable in respect of the taxes imposed by section 500 of the revenue act of 1926 shall, in so far as applicable and not inconsistent with this act, be applicable in respect of the taxes imposed by Parts I, IV, and V of this title.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the clerks at the desk be authorized, in lines 7 to 13 on page 288, and in other similar passages in the bill, to change the numbers of the parts to conform with the action already taken by the Senate in inserting new parts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That has already been voted by the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from Utah that, having passed over many of the provisions, and important provisions of the bill, upon which there will be discussions, arguments, and the like, that we take our recess now until to-morrow morning.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing that that should be done, and I want to thank Senators for the attention they have given this afternoon and for the work that has been performed by the Senate.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it take a recess until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is the regular order under the agreement entered into yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; the only matter covered in the agreement entered into last night was that the Senate would meet at 10 o'clock a. m., and sit until 7.30 p. m. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Utah? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

CONFIRMATION OF ARKANSAS POSTMASTERS

As in executive session Mr. ODDIE, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably the nominations of John H. Magee to be postmaster at Corning, Ark.; Rhetta L. Cooper to be postmaster at Hughes, Ark.; Elmer B. Wacaster to be postmaster at Mount Ida, Ark.; and Forrest L. Downs to be postmaster at Norphlet, Ark.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, as in executive session, at the request of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], I ask for the confirmation of the postmasters whose nominations I have just reported.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters in Arkansas just reported by the Senator from Nevada are confirmed. The Senate resumes legislative session.

TARIFF AND UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a radio speech of Hon. Howard S. Cullman, Commissioner of the Port of New York Authority, over the Columbia network on Thursday, May 26, 1932, on Tariff and Unemployment.

There being no objection, the speech was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Since the earliest days of American industrial supremacy we have heard the words "government" and "business" significantly coupled together. It has become usual for aspirants to public office to declare that the United States of America is the greatest corporation in the world, in which every citizen is a stockholder. This pronouncement went pretty well in the old days. While things ran smoothly citizens, like other shareholders, were content to send in their proxies and receive their dividends in prosperity.

To-day, with unemployment, hunger, and destitution stalking at our doors, with the powers in Washington answering the pleas of millions with hollow and meaningless gestures, the average citizen begins to question the ringing phrases of politicians. "If this Government is a corporation," he says, "then I must have drawn some of the nonvoting stock, so far as making my needs heard in the national councils. If this Government is a business," he concludes, "then I don't think much of business."

We have often been told by the more skeptical that our Government is run by and for business; that large industrial interests dictate and regulate our national policies. Certainly a glance at our tariff scale and the heavy burden it places on the consumer—a consideration of the various doles which during the past year have been distributed to our starving corporations—lends fuel to this contention. And yet, the desperate plight of some of our major industries seems to indicate that if business interests are running the Government they are not making a very thorough or successful job of it.

The plea is often advanced that business principles be applied to government. This sounds off-hand like a useful slogan. Lately, however, I have begun to question its validity, and for two reasons. I am not at all sure of what is meant by "business principles," and I doubt the analogy of government to business. Are business principles the high-pressure methods, born of optimism, nurtured by mechanical ingenuity, and the greed for gain which have landed our leading industrial enterprises in their present unenviable plight? If these are the methods of business, preserve our Nation from them.

Further, how far do the purposes of government really parallel those of business. A government is a nonprofit making, noncompetitive enterprise. It is designed to serve, not to exploit. Behind the complex mechanism which time and national growth have developed is a purpose forthright and direct—a purpose which I think I have heard mentioned somewhere before. The government is for the people.

Just how the people can best be served under the complex conditions of modern society is a grave problem. Vague sentiments about business and business methods will not achieve that end. I should like to submit a simple suggestion which I believe would serve as a handy weapon to battle the many difficulties now upon us. It is this: "Realism in government."

This does not, I know, sound very startling. Yet the consequences of facing facts realistically and meeting them squarely would be profound and far-reaching. Certainly at no time during the past three years has the Government attack on the pressing problem of unemployment been in any sense realistic. We do not ask our Government to perform miracles. We are aware that no human agency can, with a single gesture, lift the terrible burden of the depression from the earth, but we do ask our Government to realize that we no longer believe in miracles—that denying facts, evading issues, handing out haphazard relief will not help.

This is the situation so far as unemployment is concerned. Palliatives of all kinds have been tried, and we face problems more grave than ever. Local committees and communities have contributed to their limit. State appropriations have been distributed on a quasi-dole basis without any fundamental plan or motivation. Looking ahead, we face a critical period. Unemployment continues, savings have been dissipated, wages reduced. The resources of private philanthropic and welfare organizations are substantially reduced. States and cities, faced with disappointing tax receipts are having difficulty in balancing their budgets.

In the face of these facts it is plain that only drastic and fundamental measures will be of any value. We ask our Government to delve down into our national problems and find the reality beneath. Certainly, any economic diagnostician would at once discover a number of remediable ills. Among them, and of major importance, would be found the tariff malady—a deep-rooted disease, but one that would respond rapidly to sound and scientific treatment.

Any resident of a port district knows that it is not the depression alone that is responsible for the decline of international trade. Here in New York we have a port authority engaged in planning and developing facilities for trade and shipping as fast as modern ingenuity devises them. Yet the task of the port authority has turned out to be another labor of Hercules. For as fast as great mechanical and engineering achievements open up new commercial possibilities, they are nullified by tariff barriers which are stifling and exterminating the very trade for which our port is so admirably equipped.

The curtailment of foreign trade is a problem real and close to every citizen of the Nation. Illogical tariffs must answer not only for increased prices on protected commodities but for unemployment to millions of men and women directly or indirectly engaged in manufacturing or transporting exportable goods. The port of New York is the gateway of the United States through which 42 per cent of its foreign commerce passes. Nearly a billion dollars is invested in piers, warehouses, dry docks, and other harbor equipment. The railroads engaged in carrying imports and exports to and from the port represent an investment of $5,000,000,000 and normally furnish employment to 500,000 persons, more than the total number of wage earners in the city of New York.

With a view to organizing and coordinating the facilities of this great port for maximum shipping efficiency the Port of New York Authority was established 10 years ago. Under its auspices great bridges have been built; a giant vehicular tunnel links together sections of the port district. Plans are in progress for belt lines and all the other physical structures which make a port more serviceable. This summer will see the opening of a gigantic package-freight post office—inland terminal No. 1—which should result in great economies to domestic shippers, importers, and exporters. The port authority is continually on the watch against attempts to divert tonnage by means of freight-rate handicaps and other devices.

Modern warehouses, 1,100-foot piers, deep channels, favorable freight rates, and one of the finest natural harbors on earth—all these stand in readiness. But does foreign trade flourish in this ideal setting? Choked at the source, commerce languishes. With each added tariff barrier conceived by the petty and shortsighted interest of some monopolistic group another blow is dealt to international trade.

It is not alone that we are squandering our patrimony in leaving idle the great harbor which is our heritage. We are taking away the daily bread of the hundreds of thousands of men and women whose livelihood depends upon the activity of international commerce.

In New York there are, normally, 20,000 men at work as stevedores. The overseas shipping business represents an investment of about two and a half billion dollars and formerly employed over 50,000 seamen. Railroad workers, warehouse employees, lightermen, truckmen, freight forwarders, clerks in import and export houses, clerks in banking houses which finance foreign trade, sailors, stevedores—all these are threatened by restrictive trade policies.

Further, we must take the toll of workers in industries which once did a thriving export business. The inevitable result of our own short-sighted trade policy has been the setting up of retaliatory tariff measures by other nations. In this way our foreign markets have been greatly curtailed, if not altogether destroyed. In former years workmen in our automobile factories spent one day in six and in our typewriter industry three days in six in supplying export demand.

To-day, thanks to rising tariff barriers and the impoverishment of foreign consumers, our automobile exports are cut in half, our typewriter exports to one-third. Government statistics show that our agricultural exports have been reduced 44 per cent in two years. Italy, Austria, Poland, Finland, South Africa, and Egypt have recently increased their duties on wheat. Five countries have joined the six already maintaining a quota on the importation of wheat. The agricultural countries of southeastern Europe and the industrial countries of western Europe are moving toward a system of preferential agreements among themselves, aimed against the United States.

It is such facts as these that we ask our Government to face and to face realistically. It is plain that if we refuse, by creating prohibitive duties, to allow other nations to sell their goods to us, they not only can not but will not buy our products. The result will be the progressive crippling of international trade with unemployment and suffering to millions of Americans the inevitable consequence.

The way out of our dilemma is plain. Tariff regulation must be taken from the hands of shortsighted politicians and industrial panhandlers and recognized for the world problem it is. We must have an international tariff conference in which problems of trade regulation may be discussed and solved in the light of reason and reality.

It is not my contention that tariff revision alone will cure the ills of the world. I have neither the time to-night nor the prophetic wisdom to evaluate all the other proposed constructive measures of relief. The repeal or modification of the Volstead Act, further Federal bond issues, public-works programs—these and other sound economic measures will undoubtedly contribute to recovery.

I shall not attempt to name any precise tariff scale or policy which will solve our trade dilemma. Study, experimentation, and a broad perspective will be needed before we can be sure of embarking on the right road. There is little doubt, however, that the course our national mentors have now charted for us, so far as the tariff goes, is the wrong one. We have to-day a tariff that is neither for revenue nor for protection, in any true sense. It is a tariff for destruction. A tariff that is fast obliterating our international trade, that threatens to bring us into an abyss of industrial stagnation, of unemployment and suffering.

It is time that this disastrous course was checked. We have had enough of misleading statistics, prognostications and quixotic arguments. We have a right to ask our Government to look at the facts and to act upon them, and we have a right to say: "You people in Washington have been looking for constructive methods of creating employment. Here is a way. We will regard your response to these facts as a test of your sincerity."

THE CRISIS IN NATIONAL DEFENSE

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD copy of an address of Capt. Garrett B. Drummond, Field Artillery Reserve, president Department of Oklahoma, Reserve Officers' Association of the United States, at a rally of reserve officers at Cushing, Okla., March 9, 1932, on the subject "The Crisis in National Defense."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

There is always an inspiration to be derived from such a gathering as this, for it is in these voluntary meetings of reserve officers throughout this country that there is maintained in the large mass of the citizenry that spark of military knowledge which is so essential in time of emergency. More than that, it is here among all of us that is found the best guaranty that there shall never exist in America that so-called "military class" which our forefathers feared. We are a part of this great democracy, and there is nothing more democratic than our coming together, without pay or reward, and with only one thought—to prepare ourselves individually to render the greatest service to our country.

Of course, it is true that we derive the authority for the Officers' Reserve Corps from the provisions of the national defense act. But I like to think of the Army of the United States as it is created in that momentous law as being the final realization of that spirit expressed by George Washington when he assumed command of the Continental Army before Boston. Here is what he said: "The Continental Congress having now taken all the troops of the several colonies, which have been raised, or which may hereafter be raised, for the support and defense of the liberties of America, into their pay and service; they are now the troops of the United Provinces of North America; and it is hoped that all distinctions of colonies will be laid aside, so that one and the same spirit may animate the whole, and the only contest be, who shall render, on this great and trying occasion, the most essential service to the great and common cause in which we are all engaged."

You are familiar with the years of tragic errors which have marked our military history. You have learned the lessons to be deduced from the reliance upon ill-trained volunteer troops in the War of 1812. You understand the folly of divided responsibilities and lack of unity of command as demonstrated in our Civil War. There are among us to-night those who remember how a well-trained force in the field terminated successfully the Spanish-American War in 109 days. And all of us look back upon the World War wherein we gave the greatest example ever recorded in the history of the world of the improvisation of an army in the course of a war. As our thoughts dwell upon this chain of events we take pride in the national defense act as being the culmination of a long series of efforts to establish by law a sane and reasonable policy of national defense.

History also records the reasons for our delay in achieving this Army of the United States. In spite of defeat in battle and the enormous loss of life and prolonged cost of struggle, the American people have been too quick to forget in the days of peace the lessons to be learned from their trials of battle. Not until 1903 were we able to create the General Staff, and as late as 1913 it still was struggling for existence. The national defense act of 1916 practically destroyed its effectiveness. It was only in the revised national defense act of 1920 that we produced this Army of the United States of which we are justly proud.

Now, I am here to-night to tell you that again there is danger of disregarding the lessons of our past experiences. I want to tell you that to-day a very critical situation exists and that under the guise of misdirected economy there is a move to so cripple the components of our Army as to render the provisions of the national defense act null and void. If these efforts reach a successful conclusion, it will result in the destruction of our scheme of national defense, which to-day is being held together by the patriotism and devotion of thousands of loyal reserve officers who receive no pay for their efforts.

Last week, on the floor of Congress, in the progress of a debate dealing with the provisions of a bill which would result in a slight appropriation for the Navy, here is what a very prominent and influential Congressman said: "I want to say to my friend that the time will never come when America will pay tribute to any foreign power. I believe in an Army and Navy; but you can abolish your Navy, you can abolish your Army, to-morrow, and if any foreign power should undertake to assume jurisdiction over this country there are enough manhood and courage in the men and women of America to maintain their independence."

Gentlemen, those words are tragic. One could almost smile at the exhibition of ignorance of our history upon the part of a man high in public service. But when he speaks of the manhood and the courage of the men and women of America, he is talking about you and me, and mothers whose sons we will some day lead in battle. Here is one who advocates in the highest law-making body of our Nation that appropriations be denied the armed forces of America because it makes no difference whether they know how to take care of themselves in battle, neither does it matter whether they have the equipment with which to protect themselves, the manhood of America will respond to the defense of their homes. But when that hour comes, it is you and I who shall lead them into battle, and it is you and I who will see them suffer and die when proper training back in the days of peace would have preserved them.

Let me interpret to you briefly the attitude of the department of Oklahoma, Reserve Officers' Association of the United States, toward this matter of national defense.

We are agreed that it is contrary to the American principle of government to maintain a large Regular Army. But our associations with those officers of the Regular Establishment convince us that to-day we have reached that condition which George Washington called ideal: "A good Army rather than a large one." The officers of the Regular Army to-day are efficient and conscientious, and the evidences of their good work is in our midst. Yet we know that the Regular Army should be maintained at its present strength without a single reduction in officers or enlisted men. If any officers are eliminated from the Regular Army, it would mean that the civilian components of the Army of the United States would suffer by the loss of their instructor personnel. And without these officers of the Regular Army to guide us and to teach us and to encourage us, the Officers' Reserve Corps would degenerate into a mass of untrained individuals. So we are asking our representatives in Congress that the Regular Army be maintained at its present strength.

Our next thoughts extend to our comrades of the National Guard. You will remember that the Regular Army is not to-day at the strength authorized by the national defense act. Consequently, the National Guard, equipped as it is, and possessed of a certain amount of training, clearly has become a part of the first line of defense. But there is a move now to so reduce appropriations that the National Guard will be denied a part of its armory-drill training, and only 75 per cent of its personnel will be allowed to participate in field training. Not only would these blind economists cripple the Regular Army in its labor, but they would extend their blight to the only remaining element of our scheme of defense capable of almost immediate mobilization. The department of Oklahoma is firmly supporting the National Guard in its efforts to maintain its present allowances for drills and other training.

For ourselves we ask sufficient opportunity for active-duty training that we shall keep ourselves fit for the responsibilities commensurate with our various commissions. It is not sufficient that we learn military theory from the textbook and apply it only on the map. Yet that is the condition which the Officers' Reserve Corps is fast approaching. The last report of the Secretary of War shows that over 24,000 officers of the Reserve Corps were enrolled in correspondence courses, yet only 21,000 of them received active-duty training, and of this latter group only 15,000 were of the combatant arms. History is too full of the ill-fated ends of soldiers who knew only theory. Therefore, we plead that the recommendations of the Budget as regards the organized reserves be not reduced one cent.

Here in Oklahoma we are quite proud of the units of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps at the university and at the Agricultural and Mechanical College. The young men being trained at these institutions not only will become useful citizens of this State, but they are coming into the lower grades of the Officers' Reserve Corps with a freshness and an enthusiasm that is a bracing tonic to the rest of us. Up at the Agricultural and Mechanical College they have been forced during the present session to turn away men who desired to enroll in the advanced course. At the end of the present academic year the university will deliver to our ranks 116 newly commissioned officers of Field Artillery and the Agricultural and Mechanical College will commission 47 in the Infantry. The future of the reserve component of our Army will rest with these young men, and this department is maintaining a close liaison with the Reserve Officers' Training Corps units within the State, and we are hoping that no student who wishes to prepare himself for service to his country will be turned away because of lack of funds.

In conclusion, it is proper to state the attitude of the reserve officers in this present economic crisis. Our helpful and sympathetic aid belongs to those who are endeavoring to balance a greatly warped Budget. But we are firm in our convictions that no reductions should be made in the appropriations for the Army. It is not economy to deny funds to the military establishment, for the effectiveness of the Army of the United States in time of war will depend upon the continuity of our peacetime efforts and training. If to-day we are denied the opportunity for active-duty training, or if we lose our leaders and instructors by a reduction in the officer personnel of the Regular Army, it is true that a comparatively few dollars will be saved presently, but the balance will be struck in the future, payment will be made under the stress of war, and then not only will it cost us dollars, but there will also be demanded the blood and the lives of hundreds of our young men.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, this afternoon I gave notice that I would enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which an amendment to a committee amendment was agreed to on page 269, line 1, by which the figure "11" was stricken out and the figure "41" inserted.

Upon examining the RECORD I find that on page 269, line 13, and on page 270, line 25, the same figures, "11" and "41," appear, and the same amendment was made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is referring to the vote whereby the action was taken with reference to the admission tax?

Mr. KING. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state to the Senator that those amendments were all voted on en bloc.

Mr. KING. So it is understood that I am entering a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendments to the committee amendments were agreed to, with respect to the amendments on page 269, line 13, and page 270, line 25.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood a motion to reconsider to have been entered as to all three of the sets of figures, because the Chair understood the motion in the first place as made by the senior Senator from Utah to apply to all of them.

Mr. KING. If that is the case, I withdraw the request.

RECESS

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it is not yet 7.30 o'clock, the hour mentioned in the agreement entered into as the time to which the sessions might continue, but I ask unanimous consent that the Senate take a recess at this time until 10 o'clock to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and by unanimous consent the Senate stands in recess until to-morrow at 10 o'clock.

Thereupon (at 6 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, May 27, 1932, at 10 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, MAY 26, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come to Thee in the one universal name—"Our Father." We begin our prayer with this name. In Thee may we share the fullness of Thy mercy and power. Our needs are so countless; do Thou impart unto us wisdom, courage, and discretion, and may we perform our duties with excelling vigilance and earnestness. Let our whole lives overflow in service and sympathy for others. Just let us be burdened with every good thing that shall splendidly serve our country. In the might and glory of self-sacrifice and devotion, in the strength of faith and hope, lead us forward to our tasks. May we do nothing this day that can not bear the brave light of reason and scrutiny of conscience when we sit in the quiet hour of evening time. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

FEDERAL FARM BOARD

Mr. NELSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD a copy of a radio address which I delivered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NELSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered under the auspices of American Taxpayers League (Inc.), Wednesday, May 25, 1932:

While my subject is one dealing first with the farmer, it should also appeal to city folk. The problem of the farmer is the problem of all the people. The $500,000,000—say half a dollar every minute since the birth of Christ—appropriated to the Federal Farm Board under the farm marketing act came from all the people.

In the beginning permit me to make it plain that I do not question the honesty or sincerity of the members of the Farm Board. As they attempt the impossible they are more deserving of sympathy than censure. Frankly, though, I believe that it would have been better had the public—and the public pays the bill—been taken more into the board's confidence. Secrecy breeds suspicion. Then open acknowledgment of mistakes—and he who makes no mistakes makes nothing—would have helped. Again, the board should know that not all the complaints against it are inspired by selfish private interests. If the efforts of the board had helped the farmer as much as the most ardent advocates of the plan once thought possible, then all the grain men, all the commission men, and all other private interests combined could not have turned farmers from the Farm Board.

My lack of faith in the Farm Board plan was expressed long before any member had been named. Down deep in my heart I felt that the plan would not work; and, feeling so, I could not vote to give to the farmer a "gold brick of purest brass serene," as John W. Davis has expressed it. I remembered, too, although I did not understand, the words of another distinguished American, Herbert Hoover, then Secretary of Commerce, who had said: "Evolution of economics as applied to problems of the American farmer can not be accomplished by legislation, but must be accomplished by scientific investigation of facts followed by application and cooperation of forces involved."

In this connection, and as the board will soon have its third birthday, let us turn to its beginning. During the presidential campaign of four years ago the promise was made for Mr. Hoover that, if elected, Congress would be called in special session to enact farm-relief legislation and to bring about a limited revision of the tariff. Accordingly, Congress convened on April 15, 1929. Previous to that the House Agricultural Committee, of which I am a member, met and heard many witnesses. A special committee of five was named to draft a farm-relief measure. With few and generally unimportant changes this was reported from the committee, but not by unanimous vote. On April 25 it passed the House, only 35 Members voting against it, 5 of these being Missouri Democrats who, according to the Kansas City Star, "contended that the legislation offered the farmers of the country would fail to remedy the situation." Later the bill passed the Senate, and on June 15 was approved by the President. Announcement was made that the measure as enacted into law was "the embodiment in statute form of the promises and pledges of the party platform and of the presidential candidate elected upon that platform." A month later the Federal Farm Board was organized and went to work, being provided with ample funds (for which I have always voted), and being allowed to proceed along its own lines.

Following the adjournment of the special session of Congress, I returned to my home at Columbia, Mo., and gave out an interview in which I stated that, because we can no more suspend the law of supply and demand than the law of gravity, the plan could not be of benefit to the general farmer engaged in grain growing and in the feeding and breeding of livestock; that benefits, if any, must largely be confined to the growers of specialized crops, for instance, citrus fruits and raisins. An early loan was made to the grape growers in California, and loans now amount to many millions of dollars.

Without going into the history of the Farm Board subsidiaries or discussing salaries further than to say that some are excessive, I would merely mention the grain stabilization cooperation and the farmers' national, the salary of the general manager being $4,166.66 per month. Large loans were made in an effort to stabilize prices and through the Farm Board set-ups millions were invested in wheat and cotton. At one time wheat holdings, now reduced to ninety-odd million bushels of cash wheat with some "futures" in addition, amounted to just about a third of a billion bushels, while cotton holdings are understood to be approximately one and one-third million bales. In addition to the price paid for the wheat now held, there is a storage charge of about 36 cents per bushel, so that the loss must be very heavy. Big, though, as the direct losses may be, they become of secondary consideration when we bear in mind the depressing influence of crops held in storage, whether owned by individuals or by Uncle Sam himself, as was shown with wheat during the 1931 selling season.

This leads me to say something concerning unfortunate advice given by the Farm Board. Two years ago the American farmer was advised to hold wheat, even to build granaries. Those who took that advice did so to their sorrow. The board, though, was entirely honest. It practiced what it preached. It went out and bought and lost. So last year's wheat established new low prices, resulting in wreck and ruin.

Occasionally somebody points with pride to the fact that the wheat price is the only price that has been maintained during the last 12 months. Perhaps this is true. Wheat early hit the toboggan; hit the bottom and hit it hard. I quote from a home paper, "Local wheat at 75-year bottom." And this from Kansas, "Wheat below a quarter; a 24-cent figure is reached." So if wheat prices have not gone down during the last year it is easy to understand. Who ever heard of anything falling off the bottom of a basement?

The farmer has had a lot of advice; what he needs is price. The cotton farmer was advised to "plow up every third row." A more silly proposal was never made by a Federal agency. The farmer has been lectured, too; lectured against "blind production for an unknown demand," just as if anybody in the world could know what a given number of acres would produce, or know a year in advance what the season was to be.

Daily he was lectured about overproduction, while advocates of this program professed to see a "happy side" as the drought of 1929 destroyed the corn crop. If the farmer had nothing to sell he would get a good price for it. This was putting the bridle on the wrong end of the horse, and the farmer knew it—knew that it takes something to sell to pay interest and taxes. He was advised to turn from wheat growing and to engage in other lines of farming—poultry raising, dairying, and pork production, for instance. Some did so. It is fortunate that more did not, for eggs at 7 cents a dozen, choice hogs below 3 cents a pound on the farm, and butterfat at 13 cents per pound are far below cost.

Other countries have tried stabilization. The disastrous story is written in rubber, cotton, and coffee. Still refusing to learn the lesson, we persist. Can stabilization succeed? The answer is, yes and no. Yes; if instead of a Treasury into which there has been dug a hole more than $2,000,000,000 deep, we had an inexhaustible supply of money. Who, though, wants to try it further? In view of our own experience and the experiences of other nations with other crops, can we at a time when additional taxes amounting to more than a billion dollars are being levied, and when an overburdened people are calling for relief, afford to put more money into this project? Let those who hear answer that question.

In fairness, I would say that if it can be shown that because of the more than half a billion dollars taken out of the Federal Treasury and made available for the Farm Board the American farmer has not suffered losses as have the farmers of other countries, then the vast appropriations, including more than a million dollars annually for expenses and salaries of members and employees, may be justified. Regardless of cost, it would be worth all it cost if agriculture, the basic industry, could be made permanently profitable.

Market reports, however, show that the spread between peak prices and present prices for livestock, grain, and other products from the American farm is greater than for any other leading nation. In fact, we need not go back to the peak prices paid when hogs reached $23.40 a hundred pounds and wheat was selling at eight or ten times as much as it brought last season. It is sufficient to quote some prices the day the agricultural marketing act became a law: "Eggs, 27 cents a dozen; sweet cream, 44 cents; hogs, in St. Louis, $11.15; cattle, $14.75; and sheep, $15.25; July wheat, in Chicago, $1.08; corn, 92 cents; and oats, 45 cents." Compare with present prices.

Believing that the taxpayers of the country can not afford to continue indefinitely this agricultural marketing experiment, I have introduced a bill to prevent further efforts at stabilization by the Farm Board, to prohibit further appropriations for salaries (the House having approved of salaries for the next year), and directing that at the end of the fiscal year, June 30, 1933, the unfinished work of the board shall be turned over to the Department of Agriculture, where every proper assistance to agricultural cooperation would be given. It is the effort at stabilization that would be stopped. I digress here to say that the Secretary of Agriculture ought to be a man who is an actual farmer or one who throughout his life has been directly interested in agriculture, just as the Secretary of Labor comes from the ranks of labor.

The legislation I have in mind would represent an immediate saving of approximately $1,000,000 a year in Farm Board salaries and expenses alone (in this no reference is made to the large salaries paid by subsidiaries) and would, I believe, put an end to further heavy losses. One full year is provided in which the board may get ready for the change, so no sudden or summary action is suggested.

It represents a sensible consolidation designed to discontinue conflicting advice offered by two agencies, both of which are paid out of the same pocketbook. One of these agencies, the Farm Board, warns the farmer against overproduction, while the other, the agricultural colleges and experiment stations, the worth of which has long been demonstrated, contributes toward larger acre yields and better farming methods. The Government would no longer give warning to the father to beware of overproduction while at the same time awarding a prize to the son for a 100-bushel acre yield.

So I urge consolidation and unity where there is now division and conflict. This will make for efficiency and contribute to tax relief. In these days of high taxes and widespread unemployment, bad business, bank failures, and farm losses, the assured saving of a million dollars and the probable saving of many more millions in Government costs ought to interest everybody.

JOINT RESOLUTION AUTHORIZING ADDITIONAL DISTRIBUTION OF GOVERNMENT-OWNED WHEAT BY THE RED CROSS

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by referring to House Joint Resolution 403, which I introduced this week, authorizing the additional distribution of Government-owned wheat to the American Red Cross and other organizations for relief of distress. In that connection I also desire to introduce a letter from the Federal Farm Board upon this joint resolution, and a statement from the American Red Cross showing requisitions that have been made and the number of barrels of flour that have been distributed under the existing law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following House Joint Resolution No. 403, introduced by me, authorizing the additional distribution of Government-owned wheat by the American Red Cross, together with a letter received by me from the Federal Farm Board upon this resolution, and a statement from the American Red Cross showing requisitions that have been made and the number of barrels of flour that have been distributed under the existing law:

House Joint Resolution 403

Joint resolution authorizing the distribution of Government-owned wheat to the American National Red Cross and other organizations for relief of distress

Resolved, etc., That the Federal Farm Board is authorized and directed to take such action as may be necessary to make available, at any time prior to May 1, 1933, to the American National Red Cross, or any other organization designated by the American National Red Cross, 40,000,000 bushels of wheat of the Grain Stabilization Corporation, for use in providing food for the needy and distressed people of the United States and Territories, and in the 1931 crop-failure areas for feed for livestock. Such wheat shall be delivered upon any such application only upon the approval of the President of the United States, and in such amounts to each organization as the President may approve.

SEC. 2. No part of the expenses incident to the delivery, receipt, and distribution of such wheat shall be borne by the United States or the Federal Farm Board. Such wheat may be milled or exchanged for flour or feed, but if processed it shall be without profit to any mill, organization, or other person. In cities of over 25,000 population the American National Red Cross, or any organization designated by it, may have said flour obtained in accordance with section 2 baked into bread or processed into food for distribution: Provided, That no part of the expense incident to such baking or processing shall be paid out of said wheat or flour, and no part of said expense shall be borne by the United States or the Federal Farm Board.

SEC. 3. That is so far as wheat is donated to relief agencies by the Grain Stabilization Corporation under the terms of this resolution, the Federal Farm Board is authorized to cancel such part of its loans to the Grain Stabilization Corporation as have already been made with such wheat as security to the amount that such loans are in excess of the current market value of the wheat; and to deduct the amount of such loans canceled from the amount of the revolving fund provided by the agricultural marketing act. To carry out the provisions of this resolution the sum of $—— and such additional funds as may hereafter be found necessary is hereby appropriated and made immediately available to the Federal Farm Board, to be used solely for the following purposes:

(a) For advancing to the Grain Stabilization Corporation to repay loans held by commercial or intermediate-credit banks against wheat which would be released for donations under this resolution.

(b) For reimbursing the Grain Stabilization Corporation for its net equity in the wheat used for donations under this resolution, according to the current market value at the time of the donation.

These operations are to be carried on by the Federal Farm Board through its usual administrative staff and such additional clerical assistance as may be found necessary, without additional appropriations beyond its usual administrative appropriation under the agricultural marketing act.

FEDERAL FARM BOARD,
Washington, May 19, 1932.

Hon. AUGUSTINE LONERGAN,
House of Representatives.

DEAR MR. LONERGAN: Following our telephone conversation, I have checked with the Grain Stabilization Corporation and the American Red Cross about the quantity of stabilization wheat thus far actually used for relief purposes under the provisions of Public Resolution No. 12, Seventy-second Congress.

I find that up to Saturday night of last week the Red Cross had taken from the Grain Stabilization Corporation 17,696,109 bushels of wheat. From this wheat 1,627,231 barrels of flour were being ground and distributed throughout the United States and approximately 7,000,000 bushels diverted for feed use in last year's drought areas.

In releasing the more than seventeen and one-half million bushels of wheat to the Red Cross the Grain Stabilization Corporation had called for $8,225,000 of the $20,000,000 set aside by the Farm Board to meet the expenses involved in turning over the 40,000,000 bushels of wheat for relief purposes.

The Red Cross advises that present plans are to discontinue distributing wheat for feed purposes after May 31.

Thus far the Red Cross has had orders approved by the President for 25,000,000 bushels of wheat, approximately 7,300,000 bushels of which are yet to be obtained from the Grain Stabilization Corporation. They expect that sufficient requests will be received to use all of this 25,000,000, but at this time do not seem to be in position to make an estimate of how much, if any, of the remaining 15,000,000 bushels will be required. Based on the quantity of relief wheat called for since the resolution was adopted by Congress, it does not appear unreasonable to assume that the supply will be exhausted by the end of the summer unless there is a marked slack in the demand.

Unquestionably the donation of wheat by Congress has done much to relieve human suffering. Failure of Congress, however, to compensate the Farm Board for the wheat thus donated has seriously impaired the revolving fund from which loans are made to cooperatives and stabilization corporations. This impairment is to the point where the board will be unable to carry out the loan commitments already made if further obligations of that character are imposed by Congress.

In answer to your question, we are in hearty sympathy with your suggestion of donating additional wheat stocks for relief purposes, but if this is done it will be necessary for Congress to compensate the revolving fund for the wheat thus given away. In the present state of the revolving fund we would not be in position to authorize the release of the wheat from storage unless money were provided for that purpose. This would not be the situation had Congress seen fit to adopt the provision contained in your bill to compensate the revolving fund for the wheat given away.

You also asked my opinion relative to donating for relief purposes some of the coffee that was obtained from Brazil in exchange for wheat. This coffee can not be disposed of until fall. It is my opinion that serious difficulties would result from an attempt to distribute the coffee on the same basis as the wheat, and that it, therefore, should not be undertaken.

Sincerely yours,

JAMES C. STONE, Chairman.

GUARANTY FUND FOR BANK DEPOSITS

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11362) to amend the national banking act and the Federal reserve act, and to provide a guaranty fund for depositors in banks.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11362, with Mr. WOODRUM in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Yesterday afternoon the time for general debate was extended one hour, which gives the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON] 1 hour and 8 minutes, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] 1 hour and 6 minutes under general debate.

Mr. MCFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ANDREW].

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, in the brief time I have at my disposal I want to direct attention to two statements made by the distinguished chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee, who is the proponent of this bill. He said yesterday, as he has said in the hearings and as he said in his report, that the principle that underlies the bill providing for the guaranty of bank deposits "is accepted as sound on every hand by the Government, by the public, and by the banks themselves." It is impossible to speak for the public, but as for the Government, I have gone through the hearings before the committee on this bill and can not find a scintilla of evidence that any Government official indorses the principle of the bill.

The Treasury is called upon to contribute $150,000,000 to this fund. The Treasury is also interested in the $500,000,000 which can be levied on the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for the fund, as the Treasury must underwrite any borrowings of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for that purpose. Nevertheless, the Secretary of the Treasury was not called before this committee. There is no evidence in the hearings of his opinion, but I do find that he sent a letter to Senator NORBECK, chairman of the Senate committee, about a similar bill, in which he expressed complete disapproval of it. Secretary Mills, in this letter dated March 12, said:

> Such a plan would encourage incompetent and careless management of banks to the prejudice of sound and conservatively operated institutions. In the end, the plan would be hurtful rather than helpful to the best interests of the whole group of depositors.

It would seem natural that some members of the Federal Reserve Board should have been asked for their opinion in regard to this bill, inasmuch as half of the surplus of all the Federal reserve banks is to be commandeered and all of the member banks are to be levied upon, and it is of profound concern to the whole banking system. Yet only one member of the board, an ex officio member, Mr. Pole, Comptroller of the Treasury, appeared before the committee. On page 6 of the hearings you will find his opinion of this measure. He said that he was "unequivocally and unalterably opposed" to it. He says:

In my opinion the enactment of this bill would destroy the Federal reserve system by driving the strong banks from it. It would lead to the closing of thousands of small State banks which can not qualify as members of the Federal reserve system; it would put a premium on incompetency and irresponsibility by rendering it no longer necessary for the country banker to be concerned for the safety of his depositors.

Aside from the Comptroller of the Currency, not a single member of the Federal Reserve Board was heard by the committee. Moreover, not a single member of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was heard by the committee, and we have no evidence as to what they think of a plan which has within it the possibility of levying upon the Reconstruction Finance Corporation one-third of all of the resources which are put at its disposal by existing law.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. For a moment.

Mr. MAPES. In looking over the hearings I was impressed with the same thought the gentleman is expressing, that there was no public official, prominent or otherwise, called before the committee except the Comptroller of the Currency, and he absolutely opposes this legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts five minutes more.

Mr. ANDREW of Massachusetts. Not only is that true but bankers occupying positions of importance in the country were not called before the committee. Neither the governor nor a single member of the Federal Reserve Board or of the Federal advisory council of the reserve system, nor any officer of any Federal reserve bank appeared.

Beyond all that, very few presidents of State banking associations, who are naturally concerned with this issue, were asked for their opinions. I find there were only two presidents of State banking associations called before the committee. One of them was Mr. Ransom, the president of the Georgia State Bankers' Association.

Although I do not have time to read to you what he said in extenso, I would like to quote what the president of the Georgia bankers said on page 176 of the hearings:

All of us believe that there should be extra precaution, as you say, for the depositor; and as I see it, the double liability of the stockholder is the answer.

That is the double liability which is stricken out of this bill.

He said further:

You set up a guaranty fund that comes out of the other banks, and you are going to penalize the other banks for the failure of the particular bank that goes under. I do not think we ought to have imposed on us the added burden of being financially responsible for the faults of other institutions.

There was only one other head of a State banking association called before the committee, and that was Mr. Wiggins, of South Carolina. On page 227 of the hearings you will find that he said:

In calling on the banks to provide the money to guarantee the deposits of each other, it requires a heavy expense and a heavy burden on the sound institution for the benefit of the weaker institution. That burden is not one of investment but one of an expense. * * * In a bank of a million dollars deposits, the initial outlay would be something like $7,000, and the annual maximum that that bank might be called upon to pay would be approximately $3,500 per year. That, in most cases, is more than those banks are paying out in dividends and, in some cases, is more than those banks are earning under present conditions.

As I said in the beginning, there is not a scintilla of evidenc for the chairman's statement that the principle of the deposit guaranty "is accepted as sound on every hand by the Government and by the banks." Now, I want to call attention to another statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, which will be found on page 7 of his report. He said:

The experiences of the States having guaranty laws show that it is practical and advisable to adopt a guaranty plan for the Nation.

I do not know what experience of the States the gentleman may have had in mind, but for more than a hundred years the States of this country have experimented with deposit guaranties. I think that it was about 1830 that an experiment was made with what was known as the banking "safety fund" in New York State. Although I can not go into the details of the matter, it ended in disaster.

A similar experiment was made in Ohio shortly after the panic of 1837. It also ended in insolvency. Twenty or more years ago, after the great panic of 1907, one State after another attempted to experiment with similar measures for a joint guaranty of bank deposits. It was tried in eight different States, and every one of those experiments came to a disastrous end. It was tried first of all in Oklahoma in 1907. In Oklahoma the fund became insolvent, with a deficit of about $6,000,000, and in 1923 it was brought to an end. It was tried in Kansas in 1909, and after 20 years that experiment also came to an end with an unpaid deficit of approximately $7,000,000. It was tried in Texas in 1910, and in a few years that experiment also came to an unfortunate end. It was tried in Nebraska in 1911, and within 20 years that law was repealed, when there remained a deficit of $20,000,000 in the fund. It was tried in Mississippi, with a similar result. It was tried in South Dakota, and repealed subsequently, with a deficit in the fund of more than $30,000,000. It was tried in North Dakota, and the same experience was repeated, and the act was repealed in 1929, with a deficit remaining to be paid to the depositors of $25,000,000. It was tried in the State of Washington, with a similar loss.

So that it is hard to know just what the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency means when he says that—

The experience of States having guaranty laws shows that it is practical and advisable to adopt a guaranty plan for the Nation.

[Applause.]

We have had in this country sufficient experience with compulsory Government-administered insurance of deposits to demonstrate beyond possibility of question that it is dangerous and unworkable. It is not a new experiment that we are asked to test out. It is a demonstrated failure, which has been repeatedly weighed in the balance and found wanting.

I am opposed to the bill, not only because of this abundant experience but on equally convincing grounds of principle. As I indicated yesterday, the Steagall plan, if adopted, would remove from banking all of the advantages that accrue to honesty, care, and skill. It would penalize the well-managed banks for the benefit of those that are incautiously managed. It would put a premium on unsound banking. So much so that in my judgment the bill might very appropriately be entitled "A bill to encourage reckless and unsound banking." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GAVAGAN].

Mr. GAVAGAN. Mr. Chairman, where I was reared I was brought up to believe in the omniscience of bankers, both domestic and international. That belief was so strong and inherent in me that I believed it was possible for those bankers to pull themselves and the country up by their and its own bootstraps. But the depression came, and lo and behold, we find these master minds, these men who boasted of holding the destiny of civilization in the palm of their hands, bereft of ideas, bereft of any plan, and in a great many instances unable to tell us the cause of the cataclysm. Their only remedy seemed to be to rush to this Congress pleading and imploring us to resurrect the tottering financial system erected by them. And we acted as an ambulance company. We rushed the oxygen tanks, poured into the dying body the life-giving gas, and have tried in every possible way to aid and assist the money interests and the domestic and international bankers. Now it is time that this Congress take heed and pay a little attention to the depositors, who make this financial system possible. [Applause.] Why any banker, individual, or any group should oppose this legislation is beyond my wildest imagination, unless perchance it may be that they did not wish the stricter regulations and supervision that the bill provides.

If I were a banker—and I am not, although my good friend who preceded me from New York [Mr. CELLER] is—I am not and I am very happy that I am not; but if I were a banker, what possible objection could I have to legislation that seeks to guarantee and protect the deposits of people who trade with me? It would be to my own benefit, unless I had some deeper and more ulterior motive.

The argument has been made that this bill will encourage or cause bank failures. To my mind that is ludicrous. This bill does not attempt or intend to prevent bank failures, but without this bill, in every hamlet, in every town, city, and State of this Nation we have had bank failures, leaving in their wake a pitiful, saddening, and horrible story. Oh, no. This bill will not occasion or even prevent bank failures, but the passage of this bill will, if you please, protect the deposits and life savings of men and women who place their money in trust in these banks, without any control or possibility of control of the management of the banks. That is what this bill will do.

Furthermore, present economic conditions, no matter what the causation, are still bad and will continue to remain bad until fear is removed and dispelled. Fear to invest, fear to take money out of hoarding and place it again into the channels of trade. The banks are—and of necessity must continue to remain—the main source of credit upon which trade is dependent.

This being true, no greater boon to confidence can be given by a legislative body than the passage of this bill. It provides greater safeguards in the supervision of the Federal reserve member banks and at the same time protects the depositors. This protection in and of itself will encourage deposits, create credit, and stimulate trade without which the depression will indefinitely remain.

Ladies and gentlemen of the House, I see in this bill the silver lining in the dark cloud of depression, and in yonder sky, by reason of its passage, I perceive the rainbow of American hope, happiness, and prosperity.

[Here the gavel fell.]

I sincerely hope the bill will pass. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX] as he may wish.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee stated on the floor yesterday material amendments would be proposed by the committee.

I would like to suggest if the gentlemen sponsoring the bill hope to get anything out of it, it is time they were informing the House as to what amendments they intend to propose, which will soften the blow the legislation intends to bring down on the heads of the State banks of the country. I think the House would like to be advised as to what the committee will propose in that respect.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HANCOCK].

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, though I do not remember the individual members of our committee expressing themselves in the committee with respect to this bill, as one of the Democratic members of the committee, I find myself in disagreement with its leading members. Their views may be right and mine may be wrong with respect to H. R. 11362, and especially in its present form. I do have certain very positive convictions regarding the wisdom and expediency of this measure. I shall try to make my remarks very brief and they will be directed toward the prime purpose of the bill, which is to provide a guaranty fund out of the Federal Treasury for the protection of depositors in certain classes of banks in the country.

Upon careful analysis of this bill it would seem to me that practically every Member of the House would entertain serious misgivings as to its soundness. During these critical times many ill-conceived and dangerous proposals are being offered as solvents, and in the majority of cases a thorough study of them will reveal their fallacies. By eliminating the veneer and artificiality with which they are generally covered we clearly see that their effect would be worse on the public than the evil which they undertake to cure and remedy.

All of us know that the practices of many of the large banks have been responsible in no small degree for the present economic evils, industrial and agricultural dislocations, and human sufferings and anxieties. We all admit, too, that emergency conditions warrant emergency measures, but such measures should be sound, though extraordinary, and not mere socialistic panaceas.

It is, of course, possible that guaranty of bank deposits may sometime become a reality. If some equitable and sound system could be worked out which would take care of all the banks by the formation of a movable pool of funds contributed by the banks themselves, without Government assistance and involvement, I would be inclined to approach it favorably. With respect to this bill, however, it is my candid opinion that it is largely a political gesture which will arouse false hopes and threaten the banking structure of the Nation. In my opinion, its ultimate effect will be Government ownership of banks, and if it is wise at this time to consider such revolutionary legislation as this, it should be approached with that purpose in mind and by direct action. I confess that I have never seen any justice in the practice which affords a guaranty of Government, State, municipal, and certain fiduciary deposits, when the average individual is not given the same protection. I recognize that the proponents of this measure are actuated by a devotion to public service and that they believe the passage of this bill would be in the interest of the public welfare. I can not see it that way, for I believe that its passage would mean the destruction of thousands of State banks throughout the Nation, and especially the smaller banks which have in many instances rendered the greatest service. The soundness of a bank does not depend upon its size. It depends largely upon the character and integrity of its management. My chief reasons for doubting the wisdom of this legislation might be summarized as follows: First, it will result in a further concentration of commercial banking power at a time when the country needs a separation of the different types of banking rather than a further merging of them; second, though an effort is made to extend the benefits and privileges of the guaranty provision to State banks, under the present situation it is known of all men that thousands of them would not be able to qualify and would therefore be left out in the cold and at the mercy of the bigger banks.

Those whose financial condition, because of no mismanagement, might not pass muster with the central board to be set up in Washington, would have to liquidate. Third, the effect of the principle of this bill would put a premium on bad management and a reward on incompetency and irresponsibility and would be conducive to recklessness rather than caution and prudence. It is in direct conflict with all the traditions of this Nation with respect to individualism as against compulsion. Fourth, many mismanaged big banks could by political favoritism push themselves into the guaranty system and unload on the Government.

If it is wise and advisable that the Government shall guarantee the investment policy of our commercial banks, why not frankly go into the banking business and make the function of credit a public matter rather than a private one? If this bill is passed, the Government would be assuming the obligations while still leaving in the hands of the bankers the benefits. In my opinion, bank failures have been due to improper investment policies rather than inadequate capital structure, although increased minimum capital requirement is surely desirable. The limited demand on the part of national banks for legislation of this kind is based upon the plea that it will restore confidence. In my judgment, it will not only fail to restore confidence, but it will most surely increase the lack of confidence which we hope has been largely restored in our banking business. Though I am sure it is not the purpose of those who are sponsoring this legislation, I am satisfied that its enactment would give the national bank a certain advantage over the State bank and ultimately destroy our dual system of banking. It is an indirect and insidious way to do indirectly that which they dare not attempt to do directly. In my candid opinion, there never was a more inappropriate and inopportune time to tinker with our bank system than the present. Even the mere consideration of legislation of this character sends a tremor through the business circles of the country at a time when its nerves are on a ragged edge.

I know that the Federal reserve system has not measured up fully to the present situation and that by the adoption of a more liberal policy many banks that have closed could have kept open. It is, however, to-day the last bulwark of financial safety and security in this Nation, and nothing should be done at this time that might weaken its strength and prestige. I am in perfect harmony with the idea that the Federal reserve banks should not operate primarily for profit, and I also believe that their earnings, after the payment to the Government of a just tax for the use of its credit, should be equitably distributed among its members. No provision is made in this bill to take care of mutual savings banks with assets of over $11,000,000. Is it reasonable to suppose that these banks could retain their deposits in competition with banks whose deposits are guaranteed by the Government? Of course, I know that the proponents of this measure say that the bill does not contemplate Government guaranty but I can not read it any other way. A part of the initial guaranty fund comes from the Government, and authorization is made in the bill whereby the Reconstruction Finance Corporation can be drawn upon for $500,000,000. All of this money, in my opinion, would not last 12 months, and instead of guaranteeing deposits it would practically mean a sale of the assets of many banks to the Government. Although provision, as heretofore stated, is made for the admission of State banks into the guaranty system set up in the bill, I desire to direct your attention to line 24, on page 17, under section 208, which gives the new board here in Washington authority at any time to require an admitted bank to withdraw from participation in the benefits of the fund or to go into liquidation and receive the benefits from such participation. It is rather significant that the name of the board given these broad powers and control over all the banks is "the Federal Bank Liquidating Board." In the event of liquidation the affairs of State banks would be taken away from State authorities and turned over to the Federal board here in Washington. This board would also have the authority to dismiss any director or officer of a bank under the system at its will and pleasure. Such a concentration of power and authority in the hands of a few would seem to me to be unwise, unjustified, and against public policy.

I am reasonably confident that the more you study this bill the more convinced you will be that my conclusions are correct. If it is desirable that we should have a unified system of banking, as many of our leading bankers and economists think wise and advisable, surely such a plan should be carefully and studiously worked out and approached in the proper legislative way.

Just one further observation and I shall have finished. This depression started in the agricultural sections, and thousands of banks toppled. The life savings of men, women, and children were wiped away, reducing many of them to utter poverty and desolation. Aside from the other objectionable features of the bill, is there not an element of fairness involved, with respect to those who have lost during the past 18 months, when we consider now taking the taxpayers' money to guarantee the present depositors against loss?

Of course the plan of liquidating banks, contemplated by this bill, which would be the means of more prompt payment to depositors of a substantial part of their equity as soon as the bank is closed, is highly desirable. This is not a guaranty of banks deposits, although it may point in that direction. I trust that my thoughts and observations will be helpful to you in your effort and desire to reach a just and sound conclusion with respect to this bill. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and fifteen Members are present, a quorum.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STEVENSON]. [Applause.]

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, before I enter into my discussion of this bill as it stands, I want to state candidly to the committee, in deference to the inquiry of the gentleman from Georgia and in deference to the speech made by the gentleman from North Carolina, that the committee will propose an amendment as to the State banks which will read as follows (this amendment will be proposed to section 208, page 16):

> Any bank which is not a member of the Federal reserve system shall be permitted to contribute to the fund and to share in the benefits provided in section 206 upon the certificate of the duly constituted State examining authorities that such bank is in sound financial condition.

Then, in the concluding paragraph strike out the word "twice," following the word "to," in line 14, and strike out the word "twice," following the word "be," in line 17. That puts every State bank, big or little, that can get a certificate of health from its State banking department, in a position to be protected under this provision and become a participant in it.

The gentleman from North Carolina was very much concerned about that particular matter. I regret he did not study it more carefully before he participated in the drawing of that provision, which provided for State banks, to which he and others have been objecting, because he was the coauthor of it, and at least he ought not to turn his back upon his own offspring. But we will take away his objection by putting State banks in exactly the same position as member banks. If they are sound, they can become participants; but if they are not sound, we do not want to have them in this system.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. No; I will not yield. I have a speech to make and I do not want to have it broken up by interruptions.

Mr. COX. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he had given any consideration to the striking out of section 3, which deals with the double-liability provision?

Mr. STEVENSON. I will discuss that at the proper time.

Gentlemen, the arguments which have been presented against this measure have been directed at the question of what is good for the banks, and from the standpoint of the banks. Everybody is talking about the banks, but nobody seems to recognize that it is the great body of citizens for whom we are legislating, the people who put their money in the banks, and who are entitled, when we have supervision over those institutions, to have some consideration when it comes to dealing with the money which the people have deposited.

Somebody has compared the banks to grocery stores. Why are banks regulated? Simply because they have millions of dollars of the people's money which they are authorized to loan, to use, to invest, and are directed to return to the depositors when the depositors call for the money. That is why they are regulated.

Why does the Government have a corps of trained experts examining them and a Comptroller of the Currency to deal with them? It is because they are authorized to take the savings of the people, to invest them, to deal with them, take interest on them, and pay interest on the deposits. That is why, and we are attempting to do something for them.

But our friends say it is uneconomic and unsound. I want to call your attention to one thing. The Congress of the United States long ago recognized the fact that the people who deposit money in banks are entitled to security.

I want to direct your attention just for a minute to the terms of our own statute, and I will not read much of it. The United States Code provides for the deposit of public money. It provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall require associations thus designated to give satisfactory security by depositing United States bonds or otherwise for the safekeeping and prompt payment of the public money deposited with them and for the faithful performance of their duties as financial agents. Then when they came to adopt the farm loan act, they were so afraid that the money they deposited would not be properly secured that they put this in the law:

And the Secretary of the Treasury shall require of the Federal land banks and joint-stock land banks thus designated satisfactory security, by the deposit of United States bonds or otherwise, for the safekeeping and prompt payment of the public money deposited with them.

Therefore, gentlemen, the security of public money is provided for.

Gentlemen, if it is not uneconomic and unsound to provide that the Government shall get its money back regardless of what happens it is not uneconomic and unsound to provide for security for private depositors. It is not uneconomic and unsound to provide that the money put in these institutions shall have the same security back of it as that which is back of public money.

The reason this bill is here is because that very provision has been followed by States, municipalities, school districts, townships, and counties. The result is that in all of the cataclysms of bank failures we have had the first thing that happens is a receiver appointed. The next thing is that Uncle Sam comes along and he gets the cream of the assets. Then the State comes along, and it gets a little lower grade of assets. Then the counties, townships, towns, and school districts come along and they take the balance, and the people who have gone to the banks—trusting in the sign of the Government which is over the door—and asked for their money are told, "Oh, well, the assets are all taken up by people who had security."

Now, the question naturally arises—and it is going to confront many of you during the coming summer—as to why something has not been done for the protection of the ordinary citizen while we are protecting not only the deposits of the Government but the deposits of all governmental institutions.

Why has this become a burning question? You know how the deposits have shrunk in the last 12 or 18 months. Here is what has happened. On December 31, 1930, there was $53,000,000,000 on deposit in the banks of the United States. On December 31, 1931, there was $46,000,000,000. Did you ever think about that? Do you know how much money is in circulation in the United States? Five billion four hundred million dollars is all the money, according to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that is in actual circulation to-day in the United States. More than all the money in circulation in the United States has been withdrawn as deposits from the banks in 12 months, and this is going on. It is not as high as $46,000,000,000 to-day. Why has this money been withdrawn? Because of the very thing I have told you about.

The people have found that when a bank gets into trouble and they go to the bank for their money all the good assets are held by the Government and by Government instrumentalities and by the Federal reserve bank, which requires gilt-edged security and has a preferred lien upon most of the assets of the bank, and the people get nothing. Therefore the people say that they do not want to risk their money in this way, and if you go out into the country to-day and suggest to a man, "Why do you not deposit your money in the bank?" the answer is, "We have had enough of that. We do not get anything when the bank goes down," and the banks have been going down.

Not only this, but there has been a state of unrest and a state of suspicion and of fear that has paralyzed the communities of this country. You have seen the depositors in banks of undoubted solvency mass themselves in front of the door demanding their money and closing the doors of hundreds of perfectly good banks of this country, and yet you say that even if this measure will allay that fear it is not a good thing, because some banks may have to contribute a little to some other banks.

It is curious how these things come up. On yesterday in the Senate of the United States, or I will say in another body, a distinguished Senator was discussing international business. I am not criticizing, I am quoting with approval what he has said, and I stand with him 100 per cent in the position which he then took.

The world is cynical of our ability to stay on the gold basis. Our foreign creditors are withdrawing gold—

They just have it on deposit here—

Last week $127,000,000 was taken out of this country. Our foreign creditors are like a frightened queue of bank depositors—and you have all seen them.

We can stand the run a much longer time than our depositors think we can, but there is a limit. There is a limit to the ability of any bank to withstand a run. Not the greatest bank in the world could withstand a run if every one of its depositors appeared before its doors on a particular morning and demanded 100 per cent of his deposits.

This process of withdrawal will stop the very instant the world knows we have the will and the ability to balance our Budget on the gold basis. What we do in this room shall determine the outcome.

This is Senator DAVID A. REED, of Pennsylvania, speaking, and I translate his language into this statement. The runs on the bank, the unrest, the great panics that strike the people in different communities will be allayed the very minute it is understood the Government of the United States has provided a fund of $500,000,000 with which to guarantee that every depositor who puts his money in the bank will be able to get it out, and that there will not be a preference given to all these classes who have the right to take security and in the event of failure allow the depositors to take the shell while this preferred class takes the kernel.

This is the answer to the proposition as to what it will do.

Then, there is another matter involved, and that is the question of the insurance fund. Where does it come from, and is there any inequity in it?

You probably have not studied the question of where the Federal reserve bank gets its funds with which to operate. A bank with a million dollars of deposits has to carry $70,000 as a reserve with the Federal reserve bank. The reserves for this month, or the money on deposit from the banks of the country with the Federal reserve banks as reserves, amount to $2,123,827,000.

The Federal reserve banks use this money as they please, and they do not pay a cent of interest on it. Think of the banks of this country with $2,000,000,000 idle to-day in the Federal reserve banks, and think of the Federal reserve banks, with their great open-market powers and their power of discount and their power to raise and lower the interest rate, using this fund with which to operate. Why, the Federal reserve system is making money by the millions every year, and it has made money until to-day; it has a surplus of $257,000,000 and $165,000,000 of capital, which is nearly 200 per cent. They paid $147,000,000 into the Treasury of the United States as what they call a franchise tax. This was just a way Congress had of taking the money away from the banks and giving it to the Government. The banks of the country furnished this money, and it was furnished on the basis of the deposits in the banks. As I said a moment ago, $1,000,000 of deposits in a bank requires $70,000 to be carried in the Federal reserve bank.

So you see the money the Federal reserve banks have made has been the direct earnings of the deposits that were in the banks of the country. Therefore it is not unrighteous, it is not inequitable, it is eminently just that this great fund should be made to guarantee that when a depositor wants his money he can get it; and that is what we propose to do here.

Oh, well then, they say, that is giving the security to the fellow who manages his bank badly at the expense of the man who does not.

We are all more or less taxed that way. Most of us own homes and pay fire insurance. People are made up of three classes—the honest careful people, the honest careless people, and the dishonest scoundrels. Those are the classes when you come to deal with them in fire insurance.

When you write a fire-insurance policy, it is written on the basis of the general average, and the fellow who is a rascal and burns his house maliciously to get the insurance is taken into consideration in making up the premium that you pay.

This insurance is an illustration of that, except that we are providing the most stringent regulations, the most stringent rules, providing that the bank shall be properly managed, and we provide that if a bank official refuses to manage his bank properly he can be brought before the board, and the bank can be directed to correct that and put somebody there who will run it properly.

That is what the people of the country are calling for. You do not want to look your constituents in the face this summer and say, "I refused to protect the little bank and provide that every man who put his money in there should get it out again."

Now, gentlemen, what has happened? You talk about the guaranty fund and ask where it comes from. It comes from the earnings of the Federal reserve system—the $300,000,000 assessment on the basis of the amount of deposits that the bank has had the year before. The average deposit. That assessment would be about one-quarter of 1 per cent.

When it gets up to $500,000,000 in my judgment there would be very little danger of its being impaired.

Mr. STEVENSON. I yield myself 10 minutes more. The situation is this: If the Federal reserve banks continue to make money, 45 per cent of their profits go into that fund. Suppose it amounts to $10,000,000 a year. Four million dollars or a little more would go into the fund. The interest on the $500,000,000 required to be invested in United States bonds, making another $20,000,000, and there is $25,000,000 without touching the guarantee fund at all. That is simply to take care of the ordinary incidents of a year in which the banks do not fail oftener than usual.

For the last 11 years the total deposits tied up in failures have been $1,227,000,000. That is $102,000,000 a year. And of that there is about 25 per cent that is lost. In other words, there is saved 75 per cent. But suppose it was 50 per cent, that would be $51,227,000.

Now, I have shown you where the income will come from without assessment of the banks of more than $25,000,000 a year.

When you have put this on the statute books, with proper administration, and the funds provided are back of it, you will see the deposits coming back, and instead of forty-six billion you will have seventy-five billion in the banks inside of six months.

That increase increases the money the Federal reserve bank has to do business with and, therefore, it directly increases the earnings which will be apportioned to this fund, and under proper management there will never be any serious depletion of the $500,000,000.

There are many other phases of this question which I would like to discuss, but I do not want to take all of the time, because other men want to talk about the bill. I make this last appeal to this House, to remember that to-day everyone says that want of confidence is the trouble. That want of confidence begins with the farmer, with the washerwoman, with the blacksmith, with the railroad laborer, and all those people who have put their money into banks and lost it and found that the preferred interests have gotten the money instead of them when the bank fails. If you want to inject confidence into the people of the country and into the community, go back to your people and say to them that you have provided that when they put their money into a bank, there is a guaranty that they will get it out when they want it, and that they will not be required to take the pittance that is left after the preferred interest, the great United States Government, has taken the cream of the assets and left them with a very small amount of skim milk in the bottom of the pan. This is the proposition here, and our opponents all say that it has been a failure everywhere. That speech has been sent to at least 150 Congressmen, and we have heard it three or four times already; but, gentlemen, you can not bottom the defeat of this bill on that excuse. We have left you none, and why? For two reasons. We have provided a fund that will be ample and sufficient to take care of any call that may come, and the other reason is that the banks are not to be organized on any fly-by-night basis. The reason Nebraska failed was because they let everybody who wanted to do it establish a bank. We do not provide for their doing that. The safeguards that are put into this bill with the fund put behind it make it as different from the State systems that were set up as the United States is different from the town of Chesapeake Beach over here. That is about the comparison.

Mr. GREEN. How would the new bank be established?

Mr. STEVENSON. A national bank would not be established with less than $50,000 of capital and 10 per cent of surplus. We have abolished the 100 per cent stock liability in this bill so far as banks hereafter organized are concerned, and why? Because in the first place, in my experience, it has been a futile thing, and when you got down to litigating about it the lawyers had all that was recovered, and I have been in many of those cases myself. In the next place, we have provided a $500,000,000 guaranty fund to take the place of it. We say to depositors, "You can do as you please; if you would rather risk your money with the 100 per cent stockholders' liability than risk the great fund provided and to be maintained by the United States Government and controlled by a board that is calculated to sustain it and enforce it with absolutely honesty, well and good, you can take your money and put it into the bank where you are going to rely on the stockholders' liability, but I will put mine in the bank where we have a fund behind it that insures that I shall get that money out again." If any of you want to question that proposition, go out into the highways and byways and 9 out of 10 men will say to you, "What are you going to do, when we put our money into a bank? Are you going to provide for a better care or leave us as we are? If you do the latter, then our sock is our bank, and the potato hill is our place of safety." [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HOGG].

Mr. HOGG of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, the most widely discussed question which has received the attention of Congress during the present session has been that of banking. Over the past year and a half, with the rapid collapse of thousands of banking institutions throughout the country, it is but natural that the people should turn to Congress for relief in two respects. The unfortunate depositors whose funds are now tied up in some defunct institution, awaiting a slow liquidation, are naturally entitled to a great deal of consideration. Congress has endeavored to deal in a constructive manner with this class of our citizens by making it possible for the receivers of these defunct institutions to obtain loans from the Government with which to make prompt distribution of dividends among the depositors. This is a very proper undertaking, but at the same time such a program does not offer a great deal of encouragement for the prevention of future bank failures. It is true that it is possible for a banking institution, when threatened with a run or other unforeseen contingency, to borrow funds from the Government with which to meet a temporary stringency. However, little has yet been done to analyze the factors back of the recent failures, nor to enact legislation to safeguard against further collapse of our banking structure.

Through a conservative estimate which I have made, I am convinced that there are approximately 15,000 people in my own district who have suffered loss, or at least whose funds have been involved, through the failure of some financial institution. I further believe that I am safe in saying that none of the institutions in my district, with one or two exceptions, would have been forced into liquidation had it not been for a perfect hysteria or collapse in banking institutions generally. Our banks were practically all victims of fear brought about through collapse of banking institutions in neighboring communities or neighboring States, but regardless of the reason or the cause for a bank's suspension of business, whether through an unfortunate and unjustified run on the bank or through mismanagement, the losses suffered and the calamity caused to a community are equally as distressing.

Over the past few months I have endeavored to obtain a fair cross section of the sentiment in my district with reference to what the average citizen thinks of the cause of the collapse of these numerous banking institutions. I further sought opinion along this same line as to what could or ought to be done by Congress in the way of remedial legislation.

Practically all responses which I have received have been devoted to two particular lines of suggestion. A considerable number of well-considered communications stress the importance of Government guaranty, but this guaranty was not intended to be in every instance an absolute assurance upon the part of the Government that in the event of the failure of the bank the Government itself would undertake the repayment to a depositor of all his funds. It went farther than that. It was insisted that the Government should maintain adequate supervision over a bank and set up a guaranty not of the funds but of the practices and policies of the institution itself.

The bill which is now before the House for consideration, H. R. 11362, known as the bank guaranty bill, has for its purpose an absolute guaranty, backed by the moral responsibility of the United States Government, that a depositor of funds in a national bank or a State institution which is a member of the Federal reserve system can at any time have his funds returned to him upon demand. This is an absolute guaranty of deposits and embodies the ideas of a number of the persons with whom I have corresponded.

There is another feature of the idea of guaranty, however, which is not stressed in the bill which is now before the House. This relates to the matter of a closer Government supervision of national banks and State banks claiming membership in the Federal reserve system, and, to my mind, this question of supervision is the most important angle which should receive the attention of this Congress. The first remedial legislation, in my opinion, should be in this direction.

PURPOSE OF EXAMINATION

An examination of a bank is primarily for the protection of the depositors. A stockholder or a director has ready access to the books and records of the bank, and if he so desires he can learn of the true condition of the institution from first-hand sources. On the other hand, an individual deposits his funds in the bank and for his protection must rely upon two things:

First. The integrity and business judgment of the officers and directors.

Second. The examinations and supervision made by the Comptroller of the Currency and his examiners.

A depositor, in practically every case, believes that even if the judgment of the officers and directors should be bad he still has protection in Federal examinations. This is a natural supposition. Else why have examinations at all?

ERRONEOUS CONCEPTION OF AUTHORITY OF EXAMINER

The popular conception is that the Comptroller of the Currency and his corps of examiners are virtually dictators in the field of national banking. They are pictured as possessing unlimited powers, when as a matter of fact they have little or no power.

The prevalent idea of an examination is a critical investigation of all its affairs coupled with regulatory power to compel National banks and State banks with membership in the Federal reserve system to comply with all directions given by an examiner.

A great deal of criticism has recently been directed toward the examination of national banks, and the attitude of the general public can not be any better illustrated than the statements made by the chairman of the Senate Subcommittee on Banking and Currency in the Seventy-first Congress when he said:

> I have received numerous letters from various parts of the country where there have been bank failures asking to be told how it could happen that in some cases within 60 days after national bank examiners reported a bank in a solvent condition it would fail disastrously; and, to be specific, I have had many complaints from Kentucky about a large bank failure in that State, saying that your examiners had at a quite recent date reported the bank in a perfectly sound condition, and yet it failed and has created consternation throughout the State.

That statement typifies the attitude and conception of the general public. This criticism involves two questions:

First. Are the examiners of national banks clothed with adequate authority under existing Federal statutes?

Second. If they are clothed with adequate authority, are they discharging their duties efficiently?

Let us see just exactly what the United States statutes provide with reference to the examination of national banks.

Section 481 of Title XII of the Code of Laws of the United States, dealing with the question of the appointment power and duties of national-bank examiners, reads as follows:

> The Comptroller of the Currency, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall appoint examiners who shall examine every member bank at least twice in each calendar year and oftener if necessary. * * * The examiner making the examination of any national bank, or of any other member bank, shall have power to make a thorough examination of all the affairs of the bank, and in doing so he shall have power to administer oaths and to examine any of the officers and agents thereof under oath and shall make a full and detailed report of the condition of said bank to the Comptroller of the Currency.

EXAMINER WITHOUT POWER TO ENFORCE HIS RECOMMENDATIONS AND FINDINGS

The foregoing provision is all that can be found with reference to the examination of national banks. It authorizes only "a thorough examination of all of the affairs of the bank." It does not give authority to anyone to do anything to correct any irregularities that may be found.

The examination made under the direction of the Comptroller of the Currency may disclose many irregularities and unsound practices, but power exists in no one to correct them. This is indeed startling, but is in conformity with the weakness of the present Federal statutes. In support of this statement, I quote the following from the testimony of J. W. Pole, Comptroller of the Currency, before a subcommittee on Banking and Currency, which was presided over by Hon. CARTER GLASS, a former Secretary of the Treasury under President Wilson, in connection with hearings in the Seventy-first Congress on Senate Resolution No. 71:

> The CHAIRMAN. Right upon that point: Can you tell the committee what, if anything, is the matter with the examination system of the comptroller's office * * *?
> Mr. POLE. The one weakness, perhaps, is the fact that notwithstanding an examination may develop certain practices in banks which are objectionable, we have very little beyond moral suasion to enable us to correct those conditions except for direct violations of law, as distinguished from bad practices which may eventually bring the bank into trouble * * *.
> The CHAIRMAN. I had long labored under the impression that the powers of the Comptroller of the Currency were rather autocratic * * *.
> Mr. POLE. He has the right, Mr. Chairman, to summon boards of directors, which is very frequently done. But he has no power beyond exacting from them a promise to do certain things which might be necessary to improve the condition of the bank * * *.
> Where the bank may be under the domination of a single person, which is very often the case, you can exact any sort of promise, but performance is another thing * * *.
> The CHAIRMAN. As I understand it, your only suggestion for the correction of a situation of this kind is that somebody—either the Comptroller of the Currency or some other official or body—be given authority to remove officers of individual banks.

Up until a comparatively few months ago I shared the popular conception that the Comptroller of the Currency and his corps of examiners were virtually dictators in the field of national banking. I pictured them as possessing unlimited power, when as a matter of fact they had little or no power. I joined in the prevalent idea that an examination meant a critical investigation of all the affairs of a bank, coupled with adequate regulatory power to compel national banks to comply with all directions given by an examiner. I now learn that all of this is a myth, but I derive some consolation in the knowledge that my fallacy was shared by no less a distinguished man than Senator CARTER GLASS, a former Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, in direct supervision and charge of national banks. If a former Secretary of the Treasury, under whom the Comptroller of the Currency carries on his work of supervision, was unaware of the lack of power upon the part of these examiners, how could the general public be expected to have any different conception of the question?

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOGG of West Virginia. I yield.

Mr. GARBER. Does not the bill authorize the comptroller to file a charge against any bank official, which subsequently will be heard and disposed of by the board?

Mr. HOGG of West Virginia. This particular bill does. I am speaking of the general fault of examination of national banks. A national-bank examination at the present time, resulting in a certificate by an examiner, does not certify anything. It says that they certify that the following is the true condition of the bank. That is true enough. They may list so many deposits; they may list certain securities, but it does not certify a thing as to the soundness of that bank. Now, it seems to me that is the first thing that should be remedied.

AUTHORITY TO APPOINT RECEIVER LIMITED

It may be suggested that as an indirect means of enforcing the recommendations of the Comptroller of the Currency he could upon refusal to comply with such recommendation appoint a receiver for the bank and liquidate its affairs. This observation directs our attention to the instances wherein a receiver for a national bank can be appointed. Such authority is contained in section 1 of the act of June 30, 1876, Nineteenth Statutes at Large, page 63, which provides:

> That whenever any national banking association shall be dissolved, and its rights, privileges, and francises declared forfeited, as prescribed in section 5239 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, or whenever any creditor of any national banking association shall have obtained a judgment against it in any court of record, and made application, accompanied by a certificate from the clerk of the court stating that such judgment has been rendered and has remained unpaid for the space of 30 days, or whenever the comptroller shall become satisfied of the insolvency of a national banking association, he may, after due examination of its affairs, in either case, appoint a receiver, who shall proceed to close up such association, and enforce the personal liability of the shareholders, as provided in section 5234 of said statutes.

The only other provision of the Federal statutes with reference to the appointment of a receiver for a national bank is found in section 192, title 12, of the Code of Laws of the United States, providing:

> On becoming satisfied, as specified in sections 131 and 132, that any association has refused to pay its circulating notes therein mentioned and is in default, the Comptroller of the Currency may forthwith appoint a receiver and require of him such bond and security as he deems proper. * * *

In light of the above reference to the Federal statutes it is apparent that the appointment of a receiver for a national banking association is limited to the following cases:

First. Where an association has failed to pay its circulating notes.

Second. Where the Comptroller of the Currency is satisfied as to the insolvency of an association.

Third. Where the directors themselves violate or permit the officers to violate positive provisions of law; but even in this case a receiver can not be appointed until the Comptroller of the Currency has instituted a suit in chancery for the forfeiture of the charter of the institution. He can not of his own motion take over the affairs of the bank.

It is therefore certainly apparent that the laws with reference to the examination of national banks are very inadequate to meet modern business conditions. It is unfortunate that under the existing law all that an examiner can do is to make his examination and report his findings. His jurisdiction practically ends there.

PRESENT EXAMINATION ONLY AN AUDIT

As I have previously stated, an examination of a bank is made primarily for the benefit of the depositors; yet under our system of examination of national banks the depositor is never permitted to be informed of the business practices of his bank. An examiner can only go into a bank and make an examination of the books of the institution and verify its assets. For example, the executive officer of a bank lists certain securities or certain bills and notes receivable. The examiner can check over these items for the purpose of verification only. This same examiner can see improvident loans and poor business practices carried on through the bank and until the bank actually becomes insolvent, yet he is powerless to correct them. The examiner can see in operation practices of a national bank that will absolutely result in the collapse of the institution, yet he can do nothing until it actually does become insolvent, and then he can appoint his receiver. He must "wait until after the horse is stolen before looking to the security of the barn."

Even under these circumstances, all of this goes on without any knowledge on the part of the depositors. It is expressly forbidden that an examiner should divulge to anyone, except the officers of the bank and the Comptroller of the Currency, the findings and conclusions which he has reached. In one particular, of course, this is proper, because otherwise a very trivial irregularity might unduly disturb public confidence, with the result that the collapse of the bank would be brought about by hasty action on the part of depositors.

On the other hand, where there has been a willful refusal of a banking institution to correct practices which the Comptroller of the Currency and his corps of examiners are convinced are improvident and unwise, certainly there should be some means of warning a depositor or future customer of a bank so that additional funds may not be placed in jeopardy. Yet, due to the present state of our Federal laws on examination, just this very thing can happen. National-bank examiners may be convinced that a certain bank is engaged in practices which are going to result in the collapse of the institution. Yet they must stand by and watch, powerless to prevent a catastrophe. They must permit these sums to be deposited so long as the institution is solvent. Only when insolvency occurs can the Government, through its examining agencies, step in and appoint a receiver for the purpose of liquidation.

EFFECTIVE EXAMINATIONS WILL ASSIST IN THE RESTORATION OF CONFIDENCE

During the past few months I have been especially active in obtaining the views of a number of people in my district with reference to some of the underlying causes of bank failures. A vast majority of them have specifically mentioned inadequate examination. At the same time I am confident that not one of these people fully realized that a national-bank examiner has no real power. I have often heard the statement made that the examination of a bank really meant nothing. I discounted this statement until I took occasion to make a critical examination of the Federal statutes covering the subject, and I now rather respect these statements as to inadequacy of examinations.

Banking is the only field of activity where Federal inspection exists without adequate means of carrying out the findings of examiners. Every examining and regulatory agency of the Federal Government, with the exception of the office of the Comptroller of the Currency engaged in the examination of national banks, is possessed of unlimited power. Congress never passes a quarantine law with reference to the Department of Agriculture without placing in it the most stringent means of enforcing findings made upon results of inspection.

Here, we are facing a situation where all of a citizen's property may be involved. He deposits his money by reason of the implicit confidence which he has in his Government, which should safeguard his interests through inspection. Yet, we have fallen far short of the discharge of our duty in this particular.

There is now pending in the Senate a measure introduced by Senator GLASS dealing with the whole field of banking. Senator GLASS in his measure has recognized the inadequacy of our inspection and seeks to cover it in his measure. His bill, however, contains so many different provisions and is so highly controversial that I fear it is not going to receive speedy attention at the hands of Congress. For that reason, I have to-day introduced a separate measure dealing exclusively with the subject of examination of Federal banks. This measure is amendatory of the regular section of the Revised Statutes touching examination of Federal banks. I have confined my bill to this one feature, because I feel that it is a subject which will receive universal recognition. It is difficult to see how any opposition could be developed and, certainly, now is the time for us to give every effort toward adequate inspection of these Federal institutions.

We have done everything that we possibly can to stimulate and revive confidence in the banking institutions in this country. We have endeavored in every way possible to aid depositors in institutions in the process of liquidation. Yet up to the present time little has been done in the way of preventing a recurrence of the epidemic of bank failures which we have just witnessed. A great campaign has been in progress for some time calling upon the people to withdraw their money from hoarding. It is going to require something more than an appeal to a man's patriotism to cause him to place his money in a banking institution in which he has a violent distrust. The greatest step toward convincing him of the soundness of banking institutions in this country will be a thorough, adequate, stringent, and complete system of examination. Let him see that Congress has passed a bill giving to the Comptroller of the Currency and his inspectors authority to correct any practices which do not conform with sound business judgment. This simple legislation will do more than anything else both to restore confidence in banking institutions and to withdraw money from hoarding.

My measure applies only to national banks and makes no attempt to include even State banks which are members of the Federal reserve system on account of the possible constitutional question involved. My bill is reasonable and fair. Provision is made that when the Comptroller of the Currency, through an accredited examiner, has ascertained that questionable or improper business practices or policies are engaged in he can call upon the officers and directors of the institution for immediate correction; and in the event of their failure to comply with the direction of the Comptroller of the Currency a notice is served on the officers or directors who are responsible for this inaction calling upon them to show cause why they should not be removed. After a hearing provided for before the Comptroller of the Currency, he shall have authority to summarily dismiss and remove from office these directors or officers.

In my opinion, it will scarcely be necessary for the Comptroller of the Currency to exercise this power. As the situation now stands, those who are engaged in these improper practices are fully aware of the existing provisions of the Federal statutes. They know that so long as actual insolvency does not exist that the Comptroller of the Currency is powerless. For that reason examinations can now be treated with contempt. However, on the enactment of the bill which I have introduced it will serve formal notice upon all those engaged in these practices that the Comptroller of the Currency is now clothed with immediate authority for correction.

To outline this situation is all that is required to convince anyone that this present law should be strengthened. Some real power should be given to an examiner of a national bank. When an examination has been made and unwise business practices disclosed one of two things should happen: Either the Comptroller of the Currency should compel, with ample power conferred upon him by Federal statutes, the officers of the bank to correct these irregularities, or, if this can not be done, the public generally should be warned as to exactly what will take place in that particular institution, so that citizens of a community might safeguard and protect their own interests immediately without waiting for conditions to go from bad to worse. I believe my measure will correct the present unsatisfactory conditions surrounding examinations of national banks.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to invite attention to one proposition about this bill that has not been discussed. Yesterday when the distinguished chairman of the committee, Mr. STEAGALL, was discussing the bill I asked him if it was not true that the Federal reserve act contemplated that an interest charge should be made to the Government for the use of the Government's credit when Federal reserve notes were issued. I invited the gentleman's attention to section 16, which reads:

> And such banks shall be charged with the amount of notes issued to it and shall pay such rate of interest as may be established by the Federal Reserve Board on that amount of notes, over and above the gold security.

The big question involved in this bill is not the guaranty feature. That is a mere detail. This bill involves billions of dollars, I would say. I make that statement for this reason: That it is a question whether or not the Government is willing to give its credit to bankers to use forever. Federal reserve banks have a perpetual charter. The question is whether or not the Government credit will be given forever to the Federal reserve banks without compensation of any kind.

When the Federal reserve act was under discussion President Wilson, I am informed, took the view that bank notes should be issued; that the credit of the Government should not be behind the notes, but just the credit of the banks. Mr. Bryan entertained a different view. He said it should be a Government obligation, and then Mr. Wilson said:

> If you are going to issue a Government obligation, the Government should be paid for the use of its credit.

There was a compromise effected, and there was inserted in the Federal reserve act a mandatory provision which has never been carried into effect, that when these Federal reserve notes are issued the Government shall receive an interest charge for the use of those Federal reserve notes.

Now, this is not a new question. The question involved here is whether or not the banks shall use the credit of the Nation and not pay a penny for the use of that credit. This same question came up in 1920. I have a letter from Mr. W. P. G. Harding in which he states that the Government should receive compensation for its credit, and opposed the move at that time.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I can not. I will if the gentleman will give me some more time.

Mr. Edmund Platt, who was a Member of the House at that time, suggested that the Federal reserve banks should receive more of the profits; and he took it up with the Federal reserve banks, and he received letters from Federal reserve agents, according to my information, that the Government should receive compensation for the use of its credit.

I desire to invite attention particularly to one letter from Mr. John H. Rich, chairman and Federal reserve agent of the Federal Reserve Bank of Minneapolis. I wish to read this letter.

> FEDERAL RESERVE BANK OF MINNEAPOLIS,
> February 13, 1920.
> Mr. PIERRE JAY,
> Chairman Federal Reserve Bank, New York City.
> MY DEAR MR. JAY: I acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 7th instant, inclosing copy of your letter of the same date to Chairman Platt of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the United States Senate, proposing an amendment to the Federal reserve act under which boards of directors of the Federal reserve banks would be given the right to declare extra dividends to member banks.
> I regret to say that I am in no wise in accord with your views. This subject has had careful and anxious attention at this bank for a long period. My views reflect the position of former Governor Wold and Governor Young, with whom I have talked this matter over a number of times. It has not yet come up for consideration by our board of directors, but I am inclined to think that our directors will take about the same position that I do.

I should say in the first place that the reasons generally advanced for the payment of extra dividends to member banks are based on false assumptions. It is not true that the extraordinary earnings of the Federal reserve banks during the past two years are derived from business with the members or entirely from their balances with us. As everyone knows, these earnings are largely a product of war financing. I call your attention to the fact that on January 30, when the earning assets of the Federal reserve banks were $3,033,000,000, the balances due member banks were only $1,859,000,000. If only the balances of members with us had been employed on that date for the purpose of making a profit, the aggregate earning assets would have been cut one-third or reduced by the amount of $1,174,000,000.

The $54,900,000 of capital paid in needs no consideration because on that the members are receiving 6 per cent dividend, which, as you know, is a better rate of earnings than national banks in the eastern United States average on their loans, and as good a rate as most western banks are apt to average in a normal year.

Member banks enjoy four distinct sources of profit from a Federal reserve bank. The first is their dividend upon their capital stock on which they receive a return of 6 per cent per annum. The second source of profit is represented by the service which we give them for nothing. This represented, in the case of this bank last year, more than the equivalent of a 6 per cent dividend. The members enjoy a third source of profit from the spread between the Federal reserve bank discount rates and their own loan rates, and the aggregate of this profit in one year is by no means inconsiderable. They enjoy a fourth profit, which in many cases that I have investigaed is more substantial than the dividend payment, out of lower reserves and the ability to increase their loanable funds. With four distinct sources of profit available to them already, I can see no possible reason why we should deliberately give them a fifth.

It is clear to me that, from the standpoint of profit, member banks have not only been treated fairly but have been dealt with on a basis of liberality and generosity. It is well known that national banks have never made so much money as since the creation of the Federal reserve system. They have never enjoyed such safety or protection. While the latter benefits can not be translated directly into terms of dollars and cents, they are as valuable as anything that can be expressed in money terms. In the face of this many of them insist that they should receive further consideration and further profit. I should say that such an argument is without reason. I have observed this disposition to ask for interest on balances or extra dividends with the keenest interest. My opinion is that it is a manifestation of greed which ought to be treated as it deserves.

National banks have always operated under a franchise from the Government. They obtained it cheaply. They have paid comparatively little for the valuable rights the Government has given them over a period of half a century. The Federal reserve banks operate under a franchise, and but for this franchise the Federal reserve system would not have been possible.

It was clearly understood when the Federal reserve act was passed, and was so provided for in the act, that after expenses and reasonable dividends to members, the excess earnings should pass to the Government as a franchise tax. Undoubtedly the public support given the Federal reserve act was largely due to the fact that the people of this country believe that while in the public interest a franchise should be granted, that there should be a compensation to them. A division of the excess earnings was their compensation for granting very valuable rights. The fairness and justice of compensation by a franchise tax was clearly established and admitted in the beginning. To amend the act at this time and withhold from the Government a part of the profit which it has a right to expect, is to repudiate in part the understanding with the public on which the Federal reserve act was passed. I should be unalterably opposed to any plan of taking from the Government any part of the franchise tax to which it is justly and rightfully entitled, which it was promised in the beginning, and which is expressly provided for in the act, and turning it over to member banks which are already sufficiently compensated, and which are in no respect entitled to it.

I see no reason to buy the membership of unwilling nonmember banks by the bait of extra dividends. If nonmembers are unwilling to take a view that is broad and intelligent, and come in because they recognize the value of the advantages that member banks have enjoyed for five years, there is a serious question whether we want them in the Federal reserve system until they experience a change of view. Certainly there can be no profit in augmenting the membership by adding banks that have no possible interest except in what they can get out of us.

If I correctly understand this proposal, it means that a board of directors can independently and at its discretion declare an extra dividend at such a rate as it may determine.

It seems to me that nothing could be more dangerous than to permit 12 boards of directors to independently declare such dividends as they may see fit, with the unavoidable result that the least favorably situated bank will have to meet the dividend rate of the most favorably situated or encounter dissatisfaction among its member banks to which any present complaints would only be a circumstance.

It is unsafe to assume that the normal peace-time earnings will compare with the earnings of the last two years. As conditions adjust themselves, earnings will go back to something like the former basis. I anticipate that we will make enough to care for the continually increasing expense of operation, due largely to the increasing amount of free service that we render, to pay dividends, and to add, according to law, to our surplus. There will probably be something left over to divide with the Government, but I think it is wrong to assume that the excess will be large. If the surplus earnings in the future reach sums to compare in any way with the amounts during the last two years, it will be because the Federal reserve banks have departed from the sound policy which they have followed since the beginning and have entered the market as money-making institutions competing for business.

The payment of interest on balances due members is, in my view, as unsound as the payment of extra dividends, and for the same reasons. If this bank had paid 2 per cent on balances since organization, the amount of such payments would have reached within $300,000 of its total earnings. Obviously, we never would have been able to pay a dividend. It is clear that if we paid interest on balances, we would be forced into the market as competitors with our own members. If we were forced into the market, undoubtedly we could get the cream of the business. I think if you will suggest this to any bank that is anxious for interest on balances, you will find that they will immediately recede from their argument.

Our earnings during the last two years have been very good, but we need the excess for purposes which are more important than extra dividends to members who have already been liberally compensated. We have been able to substantially improve our surplus, which is a direct protection and of positive value to every member bank. I call your attention to this for the purpose of pointing out that the surplus is to increase, after it becomes equivalent to our capital, at the rate of 10 per cent per year. I expect to see the surplus reach a very large figure. It will be employed, as the capital is employed, for earning purposes. Would you take the position that member banks have a right to a profit derived from the employment of surplus? Such a position, it seems to me, would be very unsound.

I realize that this subject is being discussed in many banks, and I think it is perfectly natural. Some of the reserve banks have given considerable publicity to the very large amounts of money they have earned. Members who understand the situation imperfectly are naturally impressed and wonder why, if money is so easily made, they can not have some of it. We have found no difficulty in counteracting this disposition to criticize us for not giving them larger dividends.

I have long entertained a conviction that we treat member banks with great liberality. I have been somewhat apprehensive that radical agitators, of the kind that we are so familiar with here in Minneapolis and in other parts of this district, might pick up this subject and make a close analysis of exactly what profits members derive from the Federal reserve system. Such figures in the hands of men of the type that I refer to might easily be used in such a way as to cause a great deal of trouble. In fact, such men have already made the statement here in Minneapolis that the big banks are using the Federal reserve system for capital purposes, and that the Guaranty Trust Co. had borrowed from the Federal Reserve Bank of New York nineteen times its capital stock. I immediately looked up their last statement and found that this assertion was grossly exaggerated, but at that time the Guaranty Trust Co. had actually borrowed from you approximately four and one-half times its capital stock.

It is clear that if the Guaranty Trust Co. is making the difference between your rates and their own on an amount equal to four and one-half times its capital stock, that it is deriving therefrom a good deal more than an extra dividend out of the New York Federal Reserve Bank. Statements of this kind are afloat among country banks. Critics of the system are saying that the banks in the great financial centers are deriving undue advantage. They refer to the heavy borrowing of certain banks in substantiation of this statement. It seems to me that talk and agitation of this kind is far more difficult to meet than any question of fairness in granting members additional compensation, which can, I think, be met squarely upon its merits. I cite the incident referred to only to indicate that if we are to treat member banks with greater liberality than at the present time, there are some things that we must consider before we adopt any plan for extra dividends, and one of them is the effect on the public, which is already too apt, without any encouragement, to believe that the profits of all banks are unduly high.

This suggestion for extra dividends is one of the most important that has come to my attention since the organization of this bank. I sincerely trust that no proposals will be made in Congress for an amendment, or any serious attempt made to interest Congressmen or Senators in offering an amendment, until it has had the most careful study of Federal reserve agents and governors, and until the responsible officers of these banks and the members of the Federal Reserve Board find themselves in complete accord, on a policy to be followed.

I realize this question comes up frequently in your district, and that it is embarrassing to you. This is because of the peculiar situation surrounding your particular bank. Your earnings have always heavily overshadowed those of other Federal reserve banks and will naturally excite a proportionate interest. While the adoption of a plan involving extra dividends might seem reasonable to you, it might not appear in the same light to other banks. If this question is raised in Congress, I shall be apprehensive. To my mind, an extra dividend is simply an entering wedge, and I can readily see that with the encouragement so offered we will be flooded with applications from banks that want membership because they will be paid for entering the system. With such a result I do not see how a board of directors will be able to withstand the pressure that will come from the members when the time comes around to decide the amount of extra dividends. I think that instead of avoiding embarrassment we will simply get ourselves into a great many more difficulties than we have ever encountered so far. In a year of large earnings it is very easy to see that the pressure put upon the reserve banks and the Federal Reserve Board by members, for an undeserved share, might become in the highest degree burdensome and perhaps very difficult to withstand.

Very truly yours,

JOHN H. RICH,
Chairman and Federal Reserve Agent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITE].

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, probably there is no feeling in the human heart that is as sweet as that of security, of safety. There is probably nothing for which we strive as much as we do for that. When we get it we always have to pay for it. It seldom comes gratis. Few things do. In this bill I am looking for the person who is to pay for that security as well as the benefactor of that security.

I find the initial cost falls principally upon the taxpayers of the United States, and there is no direct identity between the taxpayers and the bank depositors or the bankers. Consequently, I believe it is placing the price for this security in a place it does not belong.

Another question which arises in connection with the bill as far as I am concerned, is whether or not it does make security and what will be done with this security. In confidence itself there is a great danger. I may call to your attention the fact that our present condition was largely brought about because we had too much confidence in another period. The confidence and the foolish expansion of confidence during 1928 and 1929, and the height we reached in making investments at that time is one of the reasons we are where we are. We have been told banks were closed because of lack of confidence. There is no doubt about that in many cases; but if we had had still further confidence and gone further in our investments, if there had been no real responsibility on the part of the bankers who made the investment of other people's money, as there will not be if this measure goes into effect, what would have happened to us? How far may we go in the expansion of this thing we call confidence? How far may we go in the use of other people's money and not have the same proportional, or even greater proportional, decline that we have had?

I should like very much to have an opportunity to vote for legislation that would make banking in this Nation more secure, but I am very much in doubt as to what this measure will do. There are some things in it which I like; there are other things in it I consider very dangerous; but I certainly should like to see a change in the banking laws which would make banks secure, which would make them safe.

There is no question of the great public nature of banking. Nevertheless, there is also in it an element of private management and private investment. I think this bill places a reward upon the man who gambles with banking. It does not place the price upon the gambler; it places the price upon the public and those banks which carry through and manage sanely.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE. I will yield in a moment.

In my district there is one bank that has carried through the terrible situation we have experienced in the last two years, yet it will cost that bank, on top of the penalty it has already paid, $200,000 immediately to qualify for the security provided here. Be reminded, this bill does not save anyone who has lost his money in the present depression. I think we have gone through the worst part of it. If we have, the banks which have survived so far certainly can survive to the end, or at least the most of them can. If we have not gone through the worst of it, then may God help us.

Who would be the benefactor under this law? It is proposed and suggested that the depositor receive the total benefits of this plan, but I am seriously in doubt about that. This measure, it has been pointed out, is intended to fill the vaults of the banks with money deposited there in confidence. Thus far all bankers will benefit. The faithless banker, who would be especially invited into business, as I shall show later, would especially benefit. He would be the most careless and most speculative investor of these deposits. If luck were with him, he would become the profiteer of the system. If his luck were ill, the taxpayer and the careful, conservative, faithful guardian of bank deposits would pay the costs of this improvidence and gambling. Nor is there any provision that he shall pay a penalty for his carelessness with the funds of others.

It is interesting to note that banks pay into this fund in proportion to its needs. Thus it appears reasonable if the plan is successful that the initial members shall pay the principal cost of the establishment of the system. Newcomers will then be required to pay only for its maintenance. Unless a great public demand were created, the bank which is inclined to drive advantageous bargains would undoubtedly wait until the initial year of the experience of this institution had passed and the initial costs had been paid, when it would come in at a reduced rate, as far as any part of the bill implies.

Let us now consider the bank which has faithfully joined and paid in full that may wish to withdraw from the banking business. That bank is in no way recompensed for its good faith nor for its steadfastness in this organization. It leaves behind it all but a proportional part of its final year's payment.

It is argued that public funds to-day deposited in banks require a guarantee of their security. Who pays for this guarantee? Unquestionably, the depositor pays for it, because the bank would return a lower rate of interest upon these public funds if it were not required to make security deposits against them.

The advocates of this measure dwell at great length upon the provisions for the examination of member banks. What examiner can determine the value of real estate upon which loans are made and the value of corporate stocks and bonds? No examiner can determine with any very great degree of certainty without spending months at the task whether or not banks are investing safely and sanely.

We are further assured of the guarantees of this plan by authority granted to the Comptroller of the Currency for the removal of "any officer or director of any national bank detrimental to the safe operation of such banks." Probably in all the range of our laws, at no place is such dictatorial power given any other official. The Comptroller of the Currency, without making a single definite charge, without finding one specific fault, is given authority to ruin the life career of any banker who incurs his displeasure or his critical opposition. True enough, we are attempting to protect the most sacred interests of the public, a most important interest of a most important wing of society—I mean the bank depositors. To do so, we place every banker, regardless of his worth, at the mercy of the fancies and whims of a politically appointed public official, without the assurance that that public official shall exercise the greatest discretion in the use of that power. It would not be necessary to prove the bank official incompetent. Once the public knew the Comptroller of the Currency had so accused him, the public confidence and his career which would depend upon that confidence would be under such serious question that both would end.

This House can pass no law which will take the place of good faith and conscientious, careful management of the depositors' funds by the banker. The value of the collateral upon which he lends unquestionably always will remain a problem of human judgment. Whether the banker is permitted to continue to make his loans upon his own judgment, or upon that judgment reassured by the supplementary judgment of public officials, the careful and most thoroughly protected interests in the real value of these investments upon a basis of knowledge is all they can depend upon in the final analysis for security.

It is my humble opinion that this Nation's greatest security, whether in banks or public trust or business management, must find its final defense in the character of the citizenship and not in self-enforcing and foolproofing laws. I do not deny that our banking laws can be improved. I do not deny that greater security in bank savings can be attained. I shall be pleased to have an opportunity here, as I have said earlier, to vote for laws which will protect the funds and the business of such public institutions. But no additional burdens should be laid upon the back of the taxpayer for the purpose of an experiment which has been a failure in many of our States over the period of the last century.

I am pleased to assure the House that I have had not one word of information or suggestion upon the merits or demerits of this legislation from any banker.

In my opinion, this legislation would create a paradise for swindlers. Let us imagine this proposal in operation, having been put in that state at the expense of the banks which have been sufficiently sound to have withstood the present financial storm. Then imagine the conscienceless schemer for easy profits setting up a bank which meets in every way with the provisions of this law. He applies for a charter and membership in the organization. There is no law to exclude him. Every evidence of good faith is present. Finally he qualifies. He may accept one or twenty million dollars in deposits. Why should any depositor hesitate to place his funds in this man's bank? Why should he examine the record of this bank or the character of the banker? Why should he be apprehensive of the slightest danger? The swindler chooses to lend to his associates in his nefarious scheme upon real estate or other eligible security which his own appraisers report to be worth many times its real market value; or, if he prefers to be a little careful about his own freedom, twice or three times its real value. Who could convict any of them of fraudulent intent? The ring would have the entire investment of the institution, the depositor would be protected by the bank-guaranty fund, there would be no special loser except those who paid their money into the guaranty fund. Who could be looked to to prevent such a swindle?

It is noted, too, with a great deal of interest that this bill provides for a new Federal board with three $10,000-a-year members, whose clerk hire and assistants would unquestionably be obtained at a mounting expense as the years pass, without any ground upon which to estimate the final cost. There is no excuse for making anyone responsible for the operation of this or any other such system besides the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. WILLIAMSON].

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, it is with a great deal of reluctance that I am taking the floor against some of the provisions of this bill. If there is one thing more desirable than any other in connection with the banking system of the country, it is to find some means of guaranteeing deposits and making it certain that the customers of a bank can withdraw their money when they need it. But there are several things in connection with this bill that seem to me of a highly dangerous character.

I want to refer just a moment to the fact that the guaranty provided here is not a guaranty by the banks involved but, in the main, is a guaranty by the Federal Government, by taking $150,000,000 out of the Treasury in the first instance and adding to that $150,000,000 more of the surplus in the Federal reserve system, which is the property of the Federal Government, making $300,000,000 as the Federal contribution toward the initial fund for the guaranty of the deposits of member banks of the Federal reserve system. If there is one thing that should be avoided, it is the loading down of the taxpayer by further drafts upon the Federal Treasury. It is not the business of government to assume liability for private institutions. If we are going to do that, better have the Government enter the banking business.

There is another feature of the bill, however, which, to my mind, is equally serious, and that is that the guaranty here proposed will have the inevitable result of centralizing the entire banking system of the country in the Federal reserve system, placing it immediately under its direction and making it subject to its dictation. There is no escape from that conclusion.

Mr. KELLER. Why?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Because the banks that do not come within the system and whose deposits are not guaranteed would eventually have to go out of business. People are going to do their business with institutions that have their deposits guaranteed.

It will mean, so far as the State banking system is concerned, upon which most of the country is dependent, that the system will disappear entirely, and eventually a group of institutions will take its place that will be entirely dominated and controlled by the Federal reserve system. That will be centralization with a vengeance. Our experience with the Federal reserve banks has not been such as to make us look forward to such a development without apprehension.

The portion of the earnings of the Federal reserve system that goes into the Federal Treasury is paid in lieu of a franchise tax. It ought to be paid in as a franchise tax. The Federal reserve system has outstanding $2,700,000,000 in currency. The national banks, when they issue currency, not only have to deposit Government bonds to secure it but must pay one-half of 1 per cent upon this currency. In other words, if a national bank has $100,000 in currency outstanding, it pays to the Federal Treasury $500 annually as a franchise tax. If the Federal reserve system should pay an equal franchise tax of one-half of 1 per cent upon its outstanding notes, which it uses for the purpose of profit, it would have to pay $13,500,000 annually. This is considerably more than the Federal reserve system has paid into the Federal Treasury as an annual average.

Another thing, the creation of a fund of $500,000,000, in my judgment, is wholly inadequate to guarantee the deposits involved. The total deposits of the banks that have closed since 1921 is $4,345,872,000. The probable loss to the depositors, based upon the ratio of loss to total deposits of the closed banks that have been completely liquidated, has been placed by the former chairman [Mr. McFADDEN] of the Banking and Currency Committee, and now ranking member, at $688,357,170 for the Federal reserve member banks alone, and for the potential load of all closed banks that might come in under the guaranty at $1,542,143,941.

Had the proposed bank deposits guaranty law been in effect the last 10 years, it would have been swamped and gone the way of the bank guaranty laws of the eight States that have tried out the system.

The law now proposed is very closely akin to the bank guaranty laws of the several States that have so far tried out the system. In view of the experiences of these States, it seems to me clear that the $500,000,000 fund proposed in this bill is wholly inadequate to protect deposits that aggregate $54,000,000,000.

Another feature of this bill to which I am very much opposed is contained in section 3. This section repeals the double liability of stockholders. I think every State in the Union has a provision in its banking act fixing a double liability upon all stockholders in State banks. The proposed repeal reverses a policy of the Congress which I think has obtained from the beginning of our national-banking system. If anything further could be done to encourage banking by speculators and promoters and to destroy the State banks where double liability is required, I do not know what it is. The double liability has been an instrument of stability and security that should not be lightly thrown away. The fact that all stockholders have been liable for the face value of their stock, in addition to the value of such stock, has tended to conservatism and care in bank management.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY].

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I recognize the fact it is rather difficult to discuss this bill. Most every one of us knows what he intends doing when it comes to a vote, and, therefore, we engage in so many private conversations on the side that we scarcely take note of the individual who happens to have the floor. I do not expect to fare any better than the others.

I would call your attention to the fact, if you will listen just a moment, that the banking systems in this country are composed of individuals that we call separate banks. One bank can not operate by itself or operate independently of the other banks. The national banks are in one system, we say, and the State banks are in several systems under different State laws or set-ups. They all do business with each other, and the several systems intermingle in many different ways because their interest is a common one.

During the past few years we have had a great many bank failures in this country. For the 11 years and 4 months ending with April there were 8,664 bank failures. There was $4,096,041,000 on deposit in these banks. This is the reason for our considering legislation of this kind at this time.

I believe that the bank set-ups in this country, national and State, are just half of the proposition. It is a financial set-up to be recommended and sponsored by the Government of the United States and the several States to induce people to deposit their funds with these institutions for safekeeping.

The President very recently made a strong appeal to the entire country to bring their private dollars, their individually owned money, and put it in these banks so that the banks of the country might use this property which belongs to the people. People responded nobly to this appeal and placed their money in the banks, some of which failed, because banks were failing rapidly. The people did this in order to help out. They did it out of patriotic motives.

This is one side of the proposition, and the other side is composed of the people who trusted these institutions, and there is no sort of guaranty or assurance on the part of the Government or the banks that they will be repaid their money when it is once placed in the banks.

I am not speaking particularly to the terms of this bill but to the general principle that if the banks are worthy of trust they ought to have some means of assuring the people that this trust is well imposed. There ought not to be such a thing as an institution sponsored by the Government which the Government could not sponsor back to the people, and that is why I am for a bank guaranty law.

I am not against State systems and in favor of a National system; I am not in favor of a National system as against the State systems—but I am in favor of a system that assures security to the depositors.

I believe this to be the fact: Many of the banks throughout the country have failed because of a lack of such a law as we are now considering. Perfectly sound institutions have had deposits taken out by the owners of the money and this has left such institutions without the ability to carry on, although they were perfectly solvent. This is one of the causes of so many bank failures in the last few months—lack of faith in the bank set-ups.

I said one bank does not stand alone. You know that the little banks out in the country are affiliated with the larger institutions. They call them their "correspondents" in the city. This correspondent works with these little banks throughout the country and it siphons the holdings out of the little banks and gets the people's savings out of the little banks. You ask me how? They will recommend, perhaps, South American bonds as a good, liquid investment, and sell them to the bank and the bank will sell them to a depositor for time deposits, and then it develops that they are practically worthless.

Then the big bank says to the little bank, "You sap, you do not know how to run a bank. You ought not to be in business." The big institutions, therefore, eat up the little fish. It is just like a lot of fish in a great pool—the big fish eat up the little ones.

All banks are credit sellers, and every bank is looking for advantage in selling credit, where they can get the most. They are not in it for the love of their country.

Now, they say the big institutions have to sponsor and pay for the failure of the small institutions. In many instances they rob the small institutions through business methods. A depositor in the smaller institutions ought to be recompensed for loss or damage.

Now, it is not the smaller banks that fail altogether. There was one metropolitan bank in the city of New York failed for $200,000,000. There was one in Philadelphia and one in St. Louis. It is the big institutions that are creating the greatest crisis.

They have different methods of dealing with the smaller banks. The big-city correspondent banks have "underwriting syndicates." They have "security affiliates," they have "investment trusts," and "holding companies," sponsored by banks, in order that they may reach out and get hold of business. The results on the whole have not been very helpful. What the people want is a safe place to deposit their money and get it when they call for it.

Now, let me call your attention to the growth of the postal savings.

On June 30, 1925, the postal savings amounted to $132,000,000; on June 30, 1928, it was $152,000,000. On June 30, 1929, it was $152,000,000; in June, 1930, it was $175,000,000; and in December of that year it was $245,000,000. On June 30, 1931, it was $387,000,000; and on December 30 of that year $605,000,000. Now, according to the estimates by the department for April of this year, there are $732,000,000 on deposit at the present time in postal savings.

It is not the 2 per cent that the people are getting on postal savings that caused this increase, but it is a place of deposit where the people are putting their money with the assurance that they can get it when they call for it again.

Now, it is said that the banks are against the bank guaranty law. Why? Because if they have to pay nothing into a fund to make good the losses, they are in that much. The people take the risk. The result is that individuals and separate institutions are against a law requiring banks to contribute to the common fund.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. I yield.

Mr. TAYLOR of Tennessee. Has the gentleman made any investigation as to the amount of money that is hoarded?

Mr. BUSBY. I have not gone into that. It is said that eight States have had bank guaranty laws and have given it up. Why, surely, they have given up that tremendous undertaking because of the fact that only a small part of the great community of States can not operate independently of the other part.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. For a question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. I have been very much interested in the gentleman's able discussion, and would like to support a sound banking measure, but does not the gentleman think that the pending bill in the present form is decidedly unfair to the State banks of the country?

Mr. BUSBY. No; I do not think so. The State banks are entirely provided for. The bill provides that as to State banks:

Provided however, That for a period not exceeding three years after the passage of this act banks that are not members of the Federal reserve system shall be permitted to contribute to the fund and to share in the benefits provided in section 206 upon certificate of the duly constituted State examining authorities that such bank is in sound financial condition.

I proposed that provision to the bill in committee because I wanted to take care of the State banks.

I am just talking in a general way about a bank guaranty law. The State bank can come under this act if it wants to; and if it does not want to, it can stay out. Any bank that is set up that is not strong enough to assure the people it is entitled to the confidence of the people ought to get strong enough or go out of business, because the people have to be protected if we are to remedy such catastrophes as we have now.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. I am in sympathy with the bank guaranty; but does the gentleman not think that this is a bad time for us to try to start it?

Mr. MAY. It is the only time.

Mr. BUSBY. Any time is a "bad time" for the legislation if the bankers of the country are to decide, because they will have to pay to the fund that guarantees the losses, and the losses are incident to their system, which is the very system out of which they get their profit money. As a result, they are to assure the depositors that they are going to get their money back. Banks can not do business without the money of the depositors. Does any Member expect to say that they are going to be afraid and put that fear with all these other impediments in the way and say that we can not do that because conditions are not bad enough? We have been banker-managed for 10 or 12 years, we have been managed by institutions that raised their hands against the Federal reserve system 3 or 4 years ago, because it then suggested that we get on a saner basis than the situation to which they were driving. We are banker-managed and we have had no other kind of fiscal management for the last several years, and it is time that the people who have contributed the $4,000,000,000 in deposits to the failed banks were taken care of and somebody looked after their welfare. Where have we gotten up to the present time by letting the bankers dictate the policy and manage the credit and finance of the country? Is it satisfactory to you? Is it satisfactory to your farmers? Is it satisfactory to your manufacturers, who, if they should run their machinery for 30 days, would glut the market because people have no buying power? You can not sell goods when the people have nothing with which to buy them.

Is it satisfactory to you to say, "I am going out here and I am going to oppose this legislation for the simple reason that it is not what I want—in other words, conditions are not bad enough." Do you think we must take "a little more sleep, a little more slumber, a little more folding of the hands to rest" until we reach that happy Elysian shore at which we hope to arrive, which is just "around the corner," when the promises all come true?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. In reference to postal savings, where the Government deposits the same in banks, the Government requires security for such deposits, does it not?

Mr. BUSBY. Surely it does.

Mr. STEAGALL. Not only the Government but all State governments.

Mr. BUSBY. All municipal entities; and I am informed that in the State of Oklahoma it is a felony for a public officer to deposit funds in the bank where he does not take security specifically for those funds.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, the principles contained in the bill now before the House carry out a wholesome necessary change in our national-banking system. I am indeed gratified that finally the House will have the opportunity of voting for a bill which will place on the statute books of the land real material, substantial support back of every bank which boasts of its affiliation with the national-banking system. May I pause for a moment to point out that this is another instance where progressives can see their ideas and their reforms being taken up, accepted, and written into law. We have had many instances like this in the last year; and as this terrible, cruel depression continues, all of which we foresaw, all of which we anticipated, we will see many of our proposed remedies, changes, and policies accepted and written into the law—though, alas, 10 and 15 years too late.

The older Members here, my colleagues of 10 years ago, will remember, and also as late as 2 and 3 years ago, may I be permitted to say to the younger and new Members, guaranty of bank deposits was advocated by the progressives in the House and Senate as well as progressives out of Congress. I advocated it with others, and during the last Congress I again urged it. I have had a bank-deposit guaranty bill before the committee for a long time. I can not permit this opportunity to escape without recalling our advocacy of this necessary legislation. I do so not in a spirit of "I told you so" but as a kindly admonition to the younger Members. Do not permit the old standpatters, those willing always to be of service to powerful interests, to discourage you. I know that certain leaders in this House, particularly on the Republican side, point to us progressives as terrible examples and warn you younger Members against what they call "insurgency," yet these same leaders plead and beg for our aid during times of campaigning and election.

Do you ever hear of any candidate during election time saying that he is a standpatter, that he is not for the people, that he is for the big powerful bankers, that he does not believe in individuals expressing their opinions, that he does not believe in progressive legislation, and that he stands for voting anything and everything regardless of conscience and judgment? Why, not at all. Just the reverse is true. And all that we progressives of the House are doing is living our legislative lives in accordance with sacred promises and pledges made to our constituents and made to the people of this country. It will only be a few months before the next election. I defy any man here to-day or in Congress to-day to take the stump and say that he is against the principle of guaranteeing to depositors their money deposited in the banks.

Not one will do it. Every Member who to-day spoke against this bill and who will vote against this bill—and some who have spoken against this bill have already begged me not to ask for a roll call—will take the stump and proclaim how he stands for the protection of depositors and then a lot of "ifs" and "buts" and "buts" and "ifs." The usual political bunk. Promises always, alibis constantly, and flopping when the real opportunity comes to do something. Now here is the chance, and the first chance, to vote for a law guaranteeing to depositors their own money placed in banks for safekeeping. It is my duty to briefly refer to the pioneer and yeoman service rendered on this subject and for this cause by our distinguished colleague from Nebraska, Governor SHALLENBERGER. Not only as a Member of the House but as a leader in his State and as governor of his State he obtained a bank-deposit guaranty law. He was opposed by vicious greedy bankers of his own State.

Many have since passed into oblivion, and some through the portals of the penitentiary. He was opposed by powerful—yes, politically powerful in those days—bankers of the East and Middle West. They fought him all along the line, and Governor SHALLENBERGER fought them right back and beat them at every stage of the fight up to the Supreme Court of the United States. And now these same financial bandits have passed on to a lot of babbling opponents, parroting the cry that the "law failed in Nebraska." It failed in Nebraska partially by reason of the misdeeds of some of these very men in the financial circles who are opposing this measure, and by reason of the necessarily limited field of a State system. Naturally, the confines of a State is too small for an insurance system of this kind. Not even a fire or life insurance company could survive if it had to limit its business within a circumscribed territory. Every insurance company of every kind reinsures its risks. That is the basis of every insurance plan. That is all that insurance is. The pooling of risks and the contributions to this pool to pay the loss suffered by any of the subscribers. It may be described in other language. It may be defined in nice legal phraseology, but it is only that. All this bill seeks to do is to bring all solvent, honestly conducted, well-regulated banks of the United States into an insurance system where all will contribute in the event any one of the banks becomes impaired, and through this contribution protect the depositors and save them harmless against loss.

The Committee on Banking and Currency has earned the gratitude of Congress and the gratitude of this country in its initiative in considering, preparing, and reporting this bill. The distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] is to be congratulated for his labors and great work toward this end. Mr. STEAGALL for a long time has been advocating the necessity of securing depositors and of establishing a national system of insuring bank deposits. We have conferred on this subject for several years and on many instances. The distinguished chairman and his committee are entitled to and I am sure will receive the support of the majority of the Members of this House.

Mr. Chairman, it seems almost unbelievable that in a discussion of our banking system in the House of Representatives references to bank failures are made as if they were matters of course. Have we become so callous, so indifferent as to accept bank failures as a matter of course? We talk about bank failures here as if we were talking about mortality, something that could not be avoided. It is the highest function of government to so regulate its banking system as to make bank failures impossible. [Applause.] How are we going to do it? Let us understand each other clearly. All of the opposition to this bill has been on behalf of bankers. What will it do to the big or the small banker? That question seems to be troubling some of the Members. This is not a bankers' bill; this is a depositors' law. This is a law for the protection of depositors, and you must approach it from that angle and that angle alone. Who are opposed to this bill? Every big banker in my city is opposed to it and every large chain-banking system in the United States is opposed to it and every little bit of a tottering, weak, small bank is opposed to it.

Gentlemen take the floor and ask what is going to happen to the little bank that can not qualify. What are the qualifications? A certificate of solvency from their own State department and a willingness to submit to proper bank inspection, and any bank that can not qualify under that is not worth saving. Are you gentlemen going to take the floor or by your vote refuse to protect depositors and assume responsibility for those little tottering banks which you are championing here by your opposition to this bill? This is depositors' insurance.

Mr. COX. At Government expense.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Not at all. We will get to that. This is an insurance of deposit. How much confidence have you in your bankers? We have accepted burglary insurance, and we have accepted larceny insurance, fire insurance, accident insurance, and even weather insurance. There is nothing new in the idea of a mutual insurance system. That is all this bill is. It is not at Government expense at all. It is at the expense of the banks—out of their profit—and their profits come from one source, and one source alone, and that is from the depositors' money.

If all sorts of insurance is now a permanent, inseparable part of our industrial, commercial, and social world, why not apply it to bank security and bank solvency, and bank honesty?

Do opponents of this principle desire to say it is safer to insure against burglary and robbery than it is against banking? You say the risk is too great. What a terrible commentary on the banking system of the country that the risk is too great.

It is stated that it will destroy small banks. How many failures of small banks have there been in the last two years? The list is a long one and the toll terrible. That is the answer to that.

It will put a premium on incompetency and dishonesty, say others. Not at all. The contrary is true. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY] referred to the system of selling worthless securities by the larger banks to the smaller banks. When the larger banks know they will have to put their hands in their pockets and pay the assessments on the failure of the small banks because they sold them worthless securities, they will not sell them that kind of securities. [Applause.] This law will make the bankers careful. Why? Because for the first time we are going to make them pay for their own misdeeds. What happens now if a bank goes under? In a few years you will see the same group of gentlemen back in business under another bank. When the whole banking system of the country will have to pay for it, dishonest and incompetent bankers will be driven permanently out of the banking field. Bond pluggers and fake security mongers will not be able to survive. They, too, will be driven from honest and insured banking circles.

Now let me say something to my friends on the Republican side of this House. Are you not going to support the President? Of course you are. Do you not go after me in the cloakroom out there? Do you not get after me around the lobby any time I dissent? I dissent when the President is wrong. I stand by him when he is right. [Laughter and applause.]

On December 8, 1931, in his message to the first session of the Seventy-second Congress, this Congress, House Document No. 1, the President stated:

> Our people have a right to a banking system in which their deposits shall be safeguarded.

That is exactly what this bill does. He could not have meant anything else. Safeguard the depositor! He meant just this: "That our people are entitled to a banking system in which their deposits shall be safeguarded."

He said further in the same message:

> I recommend the prompt improvement of the banking laws.

That is exactly what we are doing with this bill. But that was not all. On January 4, 1932, in a special message to Congress (H. Doc. 221), the President said in the seventh recommendation:

> Revision of banking laws in order to better safeguard depositors.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. STEAGALL. And the present administration has a bill pending in Congress dealing with the deposits in closed banks, and the funds to do the work are taken out of the surplus of the Federal reserve banks and out of the Treasury of the United States, as a part of the funds paid in there by the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. In other words, we are using public funds to pay for the incompetency and dishonesty of closed banks, and now we hear a protest when we are trying to insure against such failures. Our present bill is preventive. The gentleman is right. I have his statement in reference to closed banks right here. The President said, in signing the Glass-Steagall bill on February 27:

> I am confident that the further nonpartisan measures of reconstruction to assist the earlier payment of depositors in closed banks—

And so forth.

That carries out that idea.

On June 15, 1931, in the President's speech before the Indiana Republican Editorial Association he said:

> It is obvious our banking system must be organized to give greater protection to depositors against failures.

Now, I ask my Republican colleagues, are you going to stand by your President?

Of course, it is easy to take the floor and criticize a bill as intricate and technical as this—yes, object to a comma or a semicolon. This is a very involved bill. What we are interested in is to have the House of Representatives adopt the principle that we are going to have insurance of deposits and that we are going to put the full credit of the United States back of that system, and that we are going to have a proper system of banking inspection, so as to make failures almost impossible in the future and the money of depositors always secured. [Applause.]

Of course, a bill as comprehensive as this may have a few bugs in it, but we will take care of that. When the Federal Reserve Board and the comptroller and the administration realize that the House of Representatives means business, just let me assure you they will come forward; and if they have any constructive suggestions to make, I know the Committee on Banking and Currency in this House and in the other body, and the conference committee, will be willing to hear any constructive and helpful suggestions to improve the bill.

What constructive suggestions have the opponents of this bill made? None at all, except to cry for the weak, tottering little banks. I repeat, what we have in mind is the depositor, and the Members from rural districts, where you have small banks, should keep that in mind. I can not see how those gentlemen can join hands with the large banks of the money centers of the world in taking a stand against depositors in favor of those banks.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. As a matter of fact the bill as reported to the House was not for the benefit of the small banks at all.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Why?

Mr. SCHNEIDER. They were left out entirely.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No, no. Is anyone going to take the stand that any bank, regardless of its financial condition, can come into this system? If the gentleman goes for life insurance, they will put a stethoscope to his breast and listen to the tick of his heart and ask him a lot of questions about himself before they insure his life. If the gentleman wants to insure his property, they first find out something about that property. Do not forget that that banker is not dealing with his property. He is dealing with the depositors' money, and he must submit to certain regulation and supervision; and all this system does it this—whether you are a national bank, whether you are a member of a Federal reserve bank, or a State bank, all that is required is that you submit to proper inspection, and as long as you keep up to the required standard, as long as you are an honest, clean banker, you can stay in the system; but if you are not that, you do not deserve to be in the system, and we will let the whole world know it, so that the depositors will not lose their money through your knavery or through your incompetency.

Mr. SCHNEIDER. But if the small bank is allowed to come in, would it not come in on the same payment as the large bank and not be charged twice as much as the others already in the system?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. We are not going to charge twice as much.

Mr. STEAGALL. If the gentleman will yield, I may say the committee has agreed upon an amendment which will permit State banks to come in on equal terms with national banks.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman from Wisconsin is one of the most careful legislators on the floor of the House. By the time the bill is amended and completed we can depend upon the gentleman's support, because he is that kind of intelligent and conscientious legislator. [Applause.]

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. MICHENER. Is it not true it is contemplated by the terms of the bill that no bank without the system can come within the terms of the bill until that bank qualifies for admission into the system?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course.

Mr. MICHENER. If that be true, is it not also true there are possibly not 5 per cent of the banks in the Federal reserve system to-day which could qualify to get into the system? Is that not true?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No. If I should make such a statement as that the gentleman from Michigan and BERT SNELL, from New York, and a couple of standpatters over there would get up and shout: "You are destroying the confidence of the country."

The gentleman knows I would not make such a statement.

Mr. MICHENER. Now, wait a minute; I do not want the gentleman to go into hysterics.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; but the gentleman is hysterical.

There are only two sides to this question: Are you for a strong, safe banking system protecting the depositors, or are you for a loose banking system permitting banks to indulge in wild speculation, buy worthless securities, and dissipate the money of the depositors? The latter system has been suffered too long. As between the two I am going to stand by the bill. The time has come to do some legislating for the depositors.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. If the statement of the gentleman from Michigan is correct, what is the moral obligation of the President in encouraging people to deposit their money in banks now, if they are in danger of losing it hereafter?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I make the statement that if the gentleman from Michigan is correct then the President of the United States immediately must declare an emergency, must declare a moratorium, must stop all payment of principal and interest, and must put all the resources and power of the United States in building up of an entire new economic system.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. STEAGALL. I must repudiate the imputation against the banking system of the country. That statement is utterly unfounded. There is not an informed man in the United States who would support that statement. The truth is the banks are solvent, but they are suffering from lack of confidence on the part of depositors.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. If this bill is enacted into law, it will establish security and security creates confidence.

Mr. MICHENER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No; I have got to answer a question that has been asked me. Just a moment more and I will finish. Congress has already legislated for the banks. In fact, to date all the legislation seems to have been for the banks. I repeat again, this is legislation for the depositors. It can not possibly be objected to by any reputable, sound banking institution which is properly administered. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HOGG] referred, and quite properly so, to the meager provisions in the law requiring bank inspections. We are writing into the law in this bill volumes on the subject of bank inspection. Heretofore and under our present system, as the gentleman pointed out, inspection is required and then the examiner certifies the conditions he found. These inspections are too few and too far between. Under the system of deposit insurance provided for in this bill, frequent minute inspection would be mandatory, constant supervision required, and the moment any bank failed to keep up to the standards demanded or to the conditions required, depositors would be notified and the bank put out of the system, and that would be the end of that bank. Why? Because every other bank in the country has an interest, would have to pay, and the entire banking system would hold the board responsible if they suffered any bank to continue to the extent of entailing large losses to the fund.

So you see, gentlemen, that here first we are protecting the depositors, insuring them against loss, and we are establishing a more sound banking system than we have ever had. Of course, some banks will not be able to qualify. That is the kind of bank that has been failing and will continue to fail, losing the money of its depositors. Should we stop legislating for a better banking system on its account? Are Members opposing this bill defending that kind of a bank as against the security of the depositor? It must be one of the two. Why, this is the salvation of the small but honest and well-managed bank. Though a bank may be small in any locality, if it is sound, if it is well managed, it is entitled to join the system and its depositors are insured. That removes unfair competition from the larger banks, the chain banks, against the small but sound bank by means of gossip and whispering sales talk of the greater, better security of the larger bank or chain banks. So I repeat, at the risk of becoming tiresome, that no matter how small the bank may be, as long as it is sound and honestly managed this bill is to its advantage just as much as to the advantage of the depositors. That is why the bill is being opposed by the largest banking institutions in the country. The bill is fair in that the assessment is in proportion to deposits. It treats them all, therefore, alike. The inspection and supervision will be the same for large and small banks.

It is amusing to hear talk about malappropriating $150,000,000 out of the Treasury from the moneys heretofore paid into the Treasury by the Federal reserve system. And permit me to say that when the Federal reserve system paid this money into the Treasury it was not the money of the system; it was the profits of the system made from the money of the depositors. And, is the memory of this House so short that it has forgotten that only recently we appropriated $500,000,000 for these same banks, and in addition thereto authorized and placed the credit of this Government to the extent of $1,500,000,000 to further aid these same banks? When a bank fails and the depositors lose their all, not only are homes destroyed but business and industry crippled. The loss, therefore, to the community and to the Government in one year is more than it will ever cost the Government by a plan of this kind in a hundred years. Why, the loss to depositors in the last two years is so great and tremendous that it can not even be calculated. I therefore insist that it is high time that we come to considering the necessity of securing depositors in legislating for the banking system of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TIERNEY].

Mr. TIERNEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise as a member of the Banking and Currency Committee to oppose the passage of the Steagall bill to amend the national banking act, to provide a guaranty fund for depositors, House bill 11362.

I consider this bill economically unsound, wholly unsuited to accomplish the purpose of its title; a vicious long-ago exploded species of legislation; and at this time when we are attempting to balance the Budget and arrive at a tax bill a measure which calls for a drain of $295,000,000 on the United States Treasury.

We passed through such of the depression which saw the downfall of so many banks, and the awful losses to thousands of depositors. A few months ago these failures were stopped and our banking system and depositors protected by the passage of the reconstruction finance act and the Federal reserve gold expansion bill. We seemed to have arrived at a point where the remaining banks and the bank deposits of the depositors were reasonably safeguarded.

Looking back, we know our banking system has needed and no doubt to-day needs improvement. Guaranty banking is a fine-sounding expression. In fact, the best and to my mind the only part of the bill worthy of the great mass of the public is the title.

In the first place the United States Government under this bill, while it is milked for $295,000,000, does not guarantee a penny. This bill carries no direct Government guaranty, as many suppose.

Approximately one-half million dollars is raised to protect against the failure of a system of banking which has in its American banks the sum of $30,000,000 of American depositors. Twenty-one thousand seven hundred banks, large and small, Federal and State, would come under the guaranty plan.

The Federal reserve bank would contribute $160,000,000 out of its reserve, money due the United States, and thereby weaken its reserve banking structure. The Government would have to raise, through taxes or loan, $147,000,000 from the Treasury Department; two hundred millions raised by assessing these banks, and the Federal reserve, and the banks would be assessed another $100,000,000 a year.

Eighty-six per cent of the bank failures in the last 10 years came from the smaller banks under $100,000 capital.

Over 50 per cent of the bank failures were in banks averaging from $25,000 down to ten and five thousand dollars capital.

This bill excludes from the protection of the so-called guaranty banks under $25,000, leaving them to perish in competition with the other banks who are able to advertise their guaranty facilities.

Many of these small country banks with capital of $25,000 to $100,000 would be unable to pay their share of this huge annual contribution of $100,000,000. They would either fail or be carried by, and be a load on, the larger country or city banks, such as we are accustomed to meet in the towns and cities.

One failure like the Bank of the United States with its 60 branches for over $800,000,000, or a group of a few banks failing aggregating that sum, would, on the basis of guaranteed contributions of 50 cents on the dollar, wipe out this whole guaranty or insurance fund planned to safeguard the depositors of the 21,000 banks in the 49 States.

In other words, no matter how praiseworthy the efforts of the sponsors of this bill, at best they are creating from whatever source it may come a ridiculously inadequate sum in their effort to protect thirty billion with one-half billion dollars. No bonding company, no actuary of a standard insurance company could or would undertake such a task.

Another weakness in the bill is that it releases the bank stockholders from their double liability to the depositors of the bank in the event of the failure and insolvency of the bank as now provided by law.

Such change would also affect State banks, for many of the State bank stockholders are so obligated.

This stockholders' liability is now a part of the assets of a bank to-day and would by this bill be lost. A reissue and refinancing plan carried out to the disturbance and unrest of hundreds of our soundest banking institutions would be necessitated.

The drastic struggles and evolution of the survival of the fittest, which has left our surviving banks in good financial position and now protected by the Finance Corporation and drastic reforms, has brought out a stronger and better banking system in this country.

To-day there is room for improvement; I am sure improvements will come in time, but a bank guaranty law will not make for stronger, safer, or more careful banking. It rather affords an opportunity for the careless bank and the unsafe bank speculator to operate and get by and fail to pay his share, while the conservative, safe, and strong banker has to carry the other fellow and still maintain the fine standard of high-grade banking so many of our old-time banking institutions all over the land are known for.

We have had remarkably few bank failures in my State of Connecticut. In answer to inquiries this week to some 48 bank presidents all over my State of Connecticut on this bill I received 40 answers, every one condemning this bill.

The National Bankers Association of America, as well as State banking associations of a large number of States, have come out drastically against this bill, emphasizing its unsoundness, its tendency to upset in standards and its radical departure from traditional safe methods of handling the funds of depositors.

The testimony of John W. Pole, Comptroller of the Currency, before our subcommittee, appearing on pages 6, 7, and 22 of the minutes, sounds convincing. He says:

I have been invited by your chairman to appear this morning before your committee to express my views on H. R. 10241, the principal purpose of which is to attempt to revive the system of small country banks through a guaranty of bank deposits imposed by Federal authority.

This bill presupposes that our system of country banking stands in urgent need of a pronounced reform. With that diagnosis I am in complete accord. This bill also raises an implication of unification of our country banking system under Federal supervision and control. I am in favor of that in principle. But as to the method proposed by the bill to accomplish these results, namely, a guaranty of deposits in banks, I am unequivocally and unalterably opposed.

In my opinion, the enactment of this bill would destroy the Federal reserve system by driving the strong banks from it. It would lead to the closing of thousands of small State banks which can not qualify as members of the Federal reserve system. It would put a premium upon incompetency and irresponsibility by rendering it no longer necessary for the country banker to be concerned for the safety of his depositors.

A system of banking, with a deposit guaranty superimposed upon the local bank by governmental authority, under which some other instrumentality than the bank itself undertakes to insure the safety of deposits, will not prevent the local bank from failing, if it can not maintain a successful operation as a business enterprise. If local economic conditions are unfavorable to such a bank and if the loans are not properly made or become frozen after they are made with reasonable care, the bank will have to close its doors. No system of guaranty of deposits under such conditions will serve to keep the bank open.

I should say that to guarantee the deposits of 7,500 banks, with the possible result of closing 13,700 banks, would by no means be a remedy for the present banking situation.

This bill will not stop bank failures if we have another depression. It may force a centralization of all banks in a system unpopular and undesired. Whatever improvement we need in our banking system should be had by starting some basic system at the bottom to create and improve, rather than by starting at the top and trying to spread something over. This bank-deposit guaranty idea is not new. It has met disaster in several States.

In New York the legislature on April 2, 1829, passed what was called a bank-safety fund system. It worked along in a small way until the panic of 1837 wiped out the depositors of many banks so allegedly protected by the guaranty that also ended the law itself.

In the period between 1907 and 1917 there were enacted bank depositor guaranty laws in the States of Oklahoma, Kansas, Nebraska, Texas, Mississippi, South Dakota, and Washington. All have been unsuccessful and since repealed or became inoperative and abandoned, as the following from page 34 of the committee hearings show:

Oklahoma: Enacted in 1907 panic; inoperative in 1921, due to fund being practically insolvent; repealed March 31, 1923; deficit between $7,000,000 and $8,000,000.

Kansas: Enacted in 1909; a voluntary system, not requiring payment in full balance assessed after full liquidation; repealed, 1929; deficit, $7,000,000; inoperative since 1926.

Texas: Enacted in February, 1925; made optional bond security system, guaranteeing system; became practically inoperative in that year; repealed, 1927; deficit, $16,000,000.

Nebraska: Enacted, 1911; repealed, March 3, 1930; deficit, $20,000,000.

Mississippi: Enacted, 1914; suspended, March 11, 1930, due to deficit of $3,000,000 to $4,000,000.

South Dakota: Enacted in 1915; repealed in 1925 by legislature; reinstated by moratorium in 1926; finally repealed in 1927; deficit, $32,000,000.

North Dakota: Enacted in 1915; repealed in 1929; deficit, $14,000,000.

Washington: Enacted in 1917; voluntarily canceled when Scandinavian Bank in Seattle failed, with deposits of $9,000,000, and then all of banks in system withdrew warrants issued and not paid; inoperative since 1921.

It is argued that failures in State bank guaranty efforts should not be used as a precedent against United States Government guaranty. This is a fallacy. If this guaranty plan did not succeed in the State as to a few banks, how can it succeed in the whole United States, which is only relatively larger. In fact, the analogy is not correct. In case of the State we had the strong unit of the State guaranteeing a few, while the United States guarantees none. The bank group unit attempts to guarantee not only the units of State banks but Federal banks as well; proportionately a greater obligation and risk.

There is no doubt that the public would like a bank guaranty if such was possible.

There is no doubt that a real solid economy bank guarantee would be most welcome, yet we can not experiment with our banking structure. We can not fly in the face of experience; we can not risk the present status of our depositors, and endanger their holdings by a writing in on the statute books of the land a so-called guaranty banking law that really does not guarantee.

This law is unsound, uneconomic, perilous to the safety of existing deposits, tried and found wanting; costing our taxpayers close to $300,000,000 at a time when we are trying desperately to balance the Budget by cutting our present taxes and avoiding new ones. I want to close with an expression of confidence in American banks—especially the banks of my State. I want to say if this bill had even a so-called long-shot chance to aid the small depositor I would vote for it.

They are the people by all means we in Congress should give our first and best efforts to. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HOOPER].

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Chairman, I was one of those who, with some reluctance, voted this bill out of the committee in order that it might find its way to the floor of this House and have action taken on it. My doubts have grown during the course of the general debate. I have not yet wholly made up my mind whether I will vote for the bill or not. I will resolve that question later on during the course of its consideration.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that much has already been done in a very concrete and substantial way for the depositors in banks throughout the United States. Whether or not this bill passes, I hope that at some future time some still more carefully thought out and more scientific method of protecting depositors will be attained. [Applause.]

From some things said during the course of this debate it might seem that nothing has been accomplished for the protection of the depositors, nothing for the protection of the smaller banks during this session of Congress. This is far from the truth. The constructive legislation enacted this session and now in effect has already worked a vast amount of good, both to the small bank and its depositors.

On the 1st of January, 1931, there were $55,000,000,000 on deposit in the banks of the United States. This represented the accumulated purchasing power of the American people. By February 2, 1932, when the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was established to restore confidence, check withdrawals, and make liquid the frozen assets of banks the deposits in the 20,000 banks of the country had shrunk to $46,000,000,000. Thus $9,000,000,000 had disappeared and hoarding was continuing at the rate of $250,000,000 a week. Banks were failing at the rate of almost 100 a week.

With the restoration of confidence that has come through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation hoarding has been checked, bank deposits have increased, and a new spirit of confidence characterizes the banking institutions. Bank suspensions have decreased until they are now no larger than the ordinary run of casualties in normal times. They do not average above one-half dozen a week.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation has loaned something like $400,000,000 to 3,000 banks. The record of the distribution of these loans gives emphatic negation to the claims of some political orators who have insisted that the loans do not get down to the little institution but are confined to the great financial concerns and corporations. Out of something like 3,000 borrowing banks, 70.4 per cent are located in towns of 5,000 in population or under; 84 per cent of the borrowing banks are located in cities of 25,000 and under; of the entire amount of money loaned to banks 4.5 per cent only has gone to institutions in cities of 1,000,000 in population and over. In addition, over 100 banks have been either reopened or liquidated. Most of these are smaller institutions and the relief has gone directly to the depositors, mostly in smaller communities. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation has loaned over $25,000,000 to 46 insurance companies in order that they might extend loans to their policyholders upon the loanable value of their policies. There are in this country to-day 70,000,000 holders of live policies, so that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has brought to over one-half the population of the country a means of direct borrowing. Several million dollars have been loaned to agricultural interests through livestock and agricultural finance corporations. Millions have been loaned to building and loan institutions to enable them to extend credits to the investors in small homes who could not keep up their amortizations.

One hundred millions have gone to railroads, in some cases to prevent receivership, in some instances to extend operations, but in every case the benefits of these loans have been distributed to employees, small investors in railroad securities, and the trustee institutions which have held railroad bonds as a part of their reserve for the small investors whom they represented. In addition, from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation capitalization, through the Agricultural Department, direct loans have been made to 500,000 farmers in an aggregate sum of over $60,000,000.

This surely is a complete rebuttal of the charge that only great and powerful institutions have received benefit from this legislation. Its beneficent effects are being felt from one end of the Nation to the other, and the average citizen is the ultimate recipient of those benefits.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MICHENER].

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Chairman, I am taking this time simply to straighten out a matter which occurred a short time ago when my usually courteous friend from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] was on the floor. I am sure that if he could have seen and heard himself at the time, he would have appreciated that he should have yielded to me. I asked the gentleman if it was true that not more than 5 per cent of the banks within the Federal reserve system to-day could qualify for the system if they were not already in. I asked that question because when the chairman of the committee was before the Rules Committee asking for a rule on this bill, as I recall, the matter was discussed. I made no such an assertion, have no knowledge on the subject, and was inquiring. If it is true that there are to-day within the Federal reserve system banks which could not qualify to get into the Federal reserve system, and if this bill does give those banks the benefit of the guaranty and does deprive the State banks which are not within the system of the right to get within the system, then there would be a rank discrimination, and it would absolutely work to the detriment of the banks which are not within the system even though they are as sound financially.

So far as my personal attitude is concerned, I happen to be one of those who for a number of years have felt—progressive, radical, or whatever it might be—that the time should come, and I believe the time will come, when there will be some kind of a guaranty of bank deposits. However, I do not know whether this is the opportune time or not. I am sure that if the depositors of the country were assured at this time that bank deposits were guaranteed, much of the fear now so prevalent would be allayed. I am not on the Banking and Currency Committee and consequently have not given intensive study to this problem, and it is regrettable that the committee itself is so split up. As I read the situation but few members of the committee are enthusiastically for this bill. Others tell us that they will support it in the hope that it may be made better, and none seem to be thoroughly convinced that the bill is sound in all its provisions.

A plan to guarantee bank deposits could be readily and scientifically worked out if we had but the national-bank system to contend with; however, we must not forget the State banks and there are many more of them. In our effort to protect depositors in national banks and State banks within the Federal reserve system, we must not destroy nonmember State banks. I said destroy, and I mean not only destroy the stockholders of these banks, but I mean destroy the depositors in the bank. We all know that if there is a bank on one corner where the deposits are guaranteed by the Federal Government and a bank on the other corner where the deposits are not so guaranteed, this latter bank might as well go into the hands of a receiver at once.

Goodness knows we have had enough bank failures, and in the long run this legislation might work out beneficially, but I am just as sure that the rank and file of the people of the country do not want us to pass any legislation that will retard recovery, or ruin additional banks, their stockholders, and depositors, and in the final analysis the communities in which they exist.

I realize that in every instance where States have attempted to guarantee bank deposits the experiment has been a failure, and I am wondering whether the Federal Government can adopt a sound guaranty law as long as we have the Federal system and the systems in the several States. There must be a point somewhere where these two systems meet, or at least comply with certain general requirements. In this bill, this requirement is attempted to be met, in the provision that all banks getting the protection of the law must qualify for the Federal reserve system. If times were normal and prosperous it might be well to provide that only banks able to so qualify might operate as banks. I have been opposed to private banks for a long time, and I approve of proper regulation of all banks by the Government, but doubt the wisdom of guaranteeing, out of the Federal taxpayers' money, all depositors in all State banks where the Federal Government does not have supervision over the manner in which the bank business is conducted is questionable.

I am sure that the consideration of this bill at this time will be helpful, because it will bring forth discussion, which means further consideration, yet we all know that there is no possibility of this bill becoming a law at this session of Congress. It may pass the House, but it will not pass the Senate. The gesture may be effective as showing our desire to do something along this line, but it will not protect the depositors unless it becomes a law. We all appreciate that the Banking and Currency Committee has worked untiringly and the committee is not to blame because the bill is not perfect. The subject is a large one, a controversial one, and one which must be met in time. Therefore, as a Member of this body, believing that the American people will eventually demand proper bank-deposit guaranty, I caution this body about acting hastily, and thereby putting into effect a law which will fall of its own weight and that the Federal Government will repeat the experience of guaranty experiments tried in some of the States.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, I admit at the outset that I am not capable of throwing a great flood of light upon this very important but somewhat technical bill. I have sat through the entire general debate and have heard almost every word that has been spoken for and against the bill. With all of this help, I must admit that up until this good hour I am still in a fog as to just what this bill will do. Some of its proponents are very insistent that it provides for a thoroughgoing guaranty of bank deposits and proceed upon that theory. They insist that regardless of all other considerations, depositors should be safe beyond all question when they put their money in a bank. If safety is all they are looking for, we have the Postal Savings bank, and Government bonds are still good.

It must be taken into consideration, however, that banking is a business; it is not only holding the money in safety, but the money must be put to some use. If it is put to use, the element of safety is not the only thing that must be considered.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. What would become of our credit currency if depositors' money were put into the Postal Savings bank?

Mr. TILSON. I do not advocate it at all; but some people seem to think that is the only safe place, and looking for safety alone they deposit their money in the Postal Savings bank. But the banking business must be broader than simply furnishing a safe-deposit vault. In order to be productive money must be used when it is deposited.

This bill as originally reported, and still seems to carry that provision, calls for the immediate use of a considerable sum of Government money—$150,000,000, in fact. It is said that this sum came from earnings of the Federal reserve system as a sort of franchise tax, but I agree with both the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WHITE], who have said that the Government is entitled to some compensation for the use of its credit. At any rate, the money has been paid into the Treasury and spent. As the bill was originally drawn it provided, as it seems to me, for the taking of this very substantial sum of Government money to protect the depositors in a very limited number of banks. Banks outside of this sacred pale would, of course, be in a very sorry plight, but no account seems to have been taken of them.

In addition to the original contribution provided for the tax—and that is what we should call it—the franchise of the Federal reserve bank was to be obligated in the future as a guaranty. The net result would be that at a considerable expense to the Public Treasury, both now and hereafter, the Government would be guaranteeing the deposits of a limited number of banks.

Now we are informed that committee amendments will be offered letting down the bars and making it easy for all sorts of banks to get in. No one has thus far attempted to explain what effect this will have. If all are admitted, the standard may be so much lowered that the better grade of banks may prefer to get out rather than take the increased risk. If any are left out as not up to the standard set, what is to become of their depositors?

Everyone agrees that the greatest vigilance should be exercised in connection with the supervision of banks. No reasonable precaution should be omitted in an effort to make them safe; but so far as this bill is concerned, it would seem to be a leap in the dark. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to this debate. There is not a man in this House who does not want the depositors of the banks protected, but there is a right way and a wrong way. This is the wrong way.

As the matter has been presented in the arguments on both sides, I have been impressed by the discussion of lack of confidence in the banks of the country, and it is principally on that ground that this particular legislation is proposed at this time.

You can not restore confidence in bankers by the passage of this kind of a bill. You are dealing with effects and not with causes. The cause of loss of confidence in the banks of this country is the fact that the people have been exploited by the bankers. The people of this country know that the Federal reserve system has been mismanaged. Why do we not look at this matter in the proper way and go back and deal with the causes?

What is going on here now? For the past five years I have been pointing out various angles of this situation from the floor of this House, without any attention being paid to the seriousness of what I was saying in regard to the exploitation of the American people and the investors and the banks by these bankers to whom I have referred. You can not correct the situation unless you go to the very bottom of the cause of the trouble. I am not referring to the little bankers.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I am sorry, but I can not yield. I only have a few minutes and I want to make a connected statement.

We have had the example in the present session of Congress of an examination being made of certain phases of the situation at the other end of the Capitol by the committees in charge over there. I refer first to the Johnson subcommittee in the Finance Committee of the Senate, where they looked into one phase of this exploitation of the American investing public and the banks, where the banks were found to be loaded with South American and European securities sold them by bankers principally located in the city of New York, with the acquiescence of the Federal reserve system and with the acquiescence of the Treasury of the United States and the Department of State.

I refer also to the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency, who are now investigating the exploitations of the public through the New York Stock Exchange in other than the sale of bonds to investors. It is unfortunate that certain influences so predominate that these hearings can not proceed in an orderly manner without interruption and to the point where responsibilities can be fixed and the guilty be made to pay. There is no question in my mind that, if this Congress decides to do so, it can fix responsibilites definitely, and this should be done. The game of these bankers and the New York Stock Exchange at the present time is to avoid the fixing of responsibilities. The public are beginning to know and understand just how they have been exploited.

If you want to correct this system and restore confidence in the United States, you will have to deal with the fundamental situations which have permitted this condition to exist and to continue.

The same situation exists to-day and the same situation is going to continue to exist, because the same people are in control of the operation of these institutions and the departments of Government which should have checked and prevented this entire trouble.

I want again to remind you and remind the responsible leadership of this House that on the 18th of last December I put in a resolution calling for an investigation and an audit of the Federal reserve system in connection with its international financial operations and with reference to the use to which the money of the depositors in the banks of this country had been put by them in transferring these credits and moneys to foreign countries for the benefit of the foreigners, entirely outside of what was intended by the Federal reserve act. Has this had any attention? In the last few weeks I have been asking the Committee on Rules where this resolution is resting and requesting them to give it some attention. I have also asked for a hearing; but have I been given any hearing? No. Gentlemen of the responsible majority in this House, you are playing with fire. I am not asking for this investigation on my own account. I know what has happened, and I know what is going to happen; but I want to say to the responsible leadership here that consideration should be given to this matter.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman yield now?

Mr. McFADDEN. I am sorry I have not time to yield.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a copy of the resolution which I have introduced and also a letter which I have addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury and a letter to the Federal Reserve Board, both of which letters remain to this day unanswered. I shall insert them at the end of these remarks. These letters were written by me, I would call to your attention, when I was chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency. I am now the ranking member of that committee, and here are the Secretary of the United States Treasury and the Federal Reserve Board refusing to answer vital queries, not only important to the matter of the moratorium but important also to the very existence of the Federal reserve system. No more convincing argument, I submit, could be offered in support of my resolution calling for this investigation than this particular matter.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the right to object. The gentleman is not addressing himself to this bill. The situation is that I sympathize with practically everything the gentleman is saying, but I would like to know from the gentleman what relation the statement he is now making about the Federal Reserve Board has to this emergency legislation?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will say to the gentleman that it is very material, because the basis of this whole discussion here has been "the matter of confidence in the banking system of this country" and I am attempting to point out why there is a lack of such confidence.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. What does the gentleman suggest as an emergency measure or as an alternative for this measure?

Mr. McFADDEN. Some properly considered legislation that will deal with the causes of the situation rather than the effects of the situation.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. HASTINGS. What is the date of the gentleman's letter to the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. McFADDEN. November 21, 1931.

Gentlemen, we face a very interesting situation as regards this proposed legislation. I have no authority to speak for the administration on this matter, but I do happen to know that there is not a responsible administrative officer of this Government who is in favor of the passage of this bill. Only one, so far as I have observed, appeared before the committee in connection with the bill, and he opposed it. This was the Comptroller of the Currency.

We have a peculiar situation at this time. There is other legislation pending and that is affecting the passage of this bill. I refer to the bill which has just been reported out of our committee, the home loan bank bill. It is interesting to note that the members of our committee, when they should be standing up here voicing their sentiments against this unsound piece of legislation, particularly those on the Republican side, are absolutely silent. [Applause.] It is suggested that in order to pass the home loan bank bill they should not oppose this particular bill. It is very unfortunate because a great principle is involved here in this particular bill.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The matter referred to follows:

House Resolution 68

Resolution 68, to provide for an investigation with respect to certain activities of the Federal Reserve Board, Federal reserve banks, and member banks of the Federal reserve system

Resolved by the House of Representatives, That for the purpose of obtaining information necessary as a basis of legislation, the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House is authorized and directed, as a whole or by subcommittee, to investigate the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks, and such member banks of the Federal reserve system as may be necessary, in their activities with respect to foreign banks and foreign central banks, their open-market operations and acceptance business, and their connection with the American acceptance council, and their collaboration with other banks (American and foreign) in the operations of such banks in foreign financing, and for the purpose of this investigation the committee may make such audit of the books of the Federal Reserve Board, Federal reserve banks, and member banks of the Federal reserve system, as it deems necessary.

SEC. 2. Such committee shall, as soon as practicable, report the results of its investigation to the House, together with such recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable. For the purposes of this resolution the committee is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places in the United States or elsewhere, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to employ such experts, and such clerical, stenographic, and other assistants, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, to administer such oaths and affirmations, to take such testimony, to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures as it deems necessary.

NOVEMBER 21, 1931.

Hon. ANDREW W. MELLON,
Secretary of the Treasury, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MELLON: In connection with the consideration that will be given in the coming session of Congress relative to the Hoover moratorium of war debts and reparation payments, I shall be pleased if you will advise me at once full information relative to Germany's debt, both short and long term, and to what countries and banks they are owed, and the amounts; and also if you will furnish me a complete statement of all war debts and reparations involved in this moratorium. I am particularly anxious that this statement shall cover the short-term indebtedness which, by agreement among American and foreign bankers, has been extended to February, 1932, and any other amount of short-term indebtedness which may not have been covered by this agreement.

I am particularly anxious to know also the amount of short-term indebtedness represented by acceptances or notes made in other countries indorsed or guaranteed by the German Government or German States or financial institutions, and to what amount, if any, such obligations are held in the United States, and by whom.

In other words, I am asking you for full and complete information relative to the financial situation of Germany as affected by this moratorium, and I would also like you to include, if possible, the entire debt which the German Government or her States and political subdivisions or her people owe to this country or any other country. Your prompt attention to this will oblige.

Respectfully yours,

L. T. MCFADDEN.

NOVEMBER 23, 1931.

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: In connection with the consideration that will be given by the coming session of Congress to the Hoover moratorium, I shall be pleased if you will advise me the total amount and character of all short-term German indebtedness which is now in the United States and by whom held and the amounts. I should like this to include not only direct borrowings between banks, banking or acceptance houses on the part of the Germans or any of their institutions, but also any obligations indorsed or otherwise guaranteed by the German Government or any company or banking institution or individuals in or outside of Germany—in other words, to show the entire situation of German short-term indebtedness, together with any agreements as to extension or payments or any acceptances or other obligations now held by Federal reserve banks taken through any foreign acceptance house or banks.

I should also like to have particularly identified a list of the names of the holders and the amounts held by each of the short-term indebtedness in the United States covered by the American and English extension agreement, which runs until February, 1932.

I should also like a statement of all loans or credits established by the 12 Federal reserve banks to other central banks or the Bank for International Settlements and the character of such loans or credits and in each instance how secured and the total itemized amounts now unpaid.

Also please advise me what commitments on the part of the Federal reserve banks or the Federal Reserve Board are outstanding relating to loans, credits, or gold; also whether or not any agreement or understanding exists at the present time with any of the central banks or their governments, including the Bank for International Settlements, in regard to changes of discount rates or gold movements.

I should also like to be informed as to what amount, if any, of the so-called short-term German, English, or Russian acceptances were held at the time of the moratorium or are now held by any of the 12 Federal reserve banks and the amount so held by each bank, and please state whether such banks procured these acceptances by direct purchase or through rediscount for member banks.

Also, please advise the amount of money the Federal reserve banks now have on deposit with the Bank for International Settlements and what amount, if any, of paper the Federal reserve now holds taken from the Bank for International Settlements, or any other agreements upon which the Federal reserve banks are bound in any manner whatsoever.

If any amount of these German, English, or Russian acceptances were on the date of the moratorium, or are now, held by the Federal reserve banks, what amounts of each are held by any of the Federal reserve agents as security for outstanding Federal reserve notes?

Very truly yours,

L. T. MCFADDEN.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIROVICH].

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, yesterday memorial services were conducted for 19 Members of the House and Senate who have made their last pilgrimage to that eternal resting place from whose bourne no traveler ever returns. They are outward bound on a steamer called Mystery, flying no flag, having no crew, no compass, but Almighty God as their pilot. Each of these souls had contributed his all upon the altar of patriotic service to our Republic. Some day—and I hope it may be in the long distant future—the genial, gracious, and lovable chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the Hon. HENRY STEAGALL, will make that journey. When his book of life will be opened and therein read the things that he has accomplished in behalf of the people whom he served, I know that no greater commendation could be given to him than having performed what in my opinion is the greatest service to our fellow citizens of this Republic in having sponsored this economic and humanitarian bill "to amend the national banking act and the Federal reserve act, and to provide a guaranty fund for depositors in banks." [Applause.]

This bill guaranteeing bank deposits would bring security to the mothers and fathers of our homes; establish confidence in business, commerce, and industry; release money from the hoarding places in which it is now being kept; and help thaw out the frozen confidence found everywhere throughout the United States against those who run the banking system of our country.

What is the commodity in which banks deal? It is money. Money is the medium of exchange. It bears the same relationship to society in the material world that blood does to the human body. It lives through circulation. Money represents the frozen labor of the past, the liquid flow of the present, and the only thing we look forward to in our old age for protection and help. To protect it we place it in banks. There are two kinds of banks: Federal banks, supervised by the National Government, and State banks, controlled by the State authorities. There are 20,000 banks in the United States. The greatest number of these are State banks. For the years 1921 to the year 1931, 7,800 banks failed with deposits of over $2,000,000,000. According to the annual report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1931, the average amount of recovery to depositors through liquidation was 88.4 per cent. The American Bankers Association Journal of February, 1931, shows 90 per cent of this amount was recovered to depositors, while the Bankers Monthly of February, 1932, shows 88.4 per cent returned to depositors.

If we had had a guaranty of bank deposits during the last 10 years, no home would have been impaired, no business would have been destroyed, no runs on banks would have taken place, and no hoarding, in which billions of dollars have been taken from circulation in our country, would have occurred. Confidence in our banks would have remained, business would have been stabilized, and the causes that are responsible for our economic depression would have been sought for in order to prevent their future recurrence. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, we have life insurance, accident insurance, health insurance, burglary insurance, fire insurance. Why not bank insurance? Is it safer to say to the people of the United States that we can insure everything in our country, but we can not insure banks? Why, for four years I was president of a large national bank in New York City, and learned that every dollar that is placed in most of our banks by the Government, by the State, and by the city or municipality has to be protected by securing to these groups collateral securities in the form of bonds, Federal reserve notes, and other big board securities. If the Government, the State, and the city insist upon a guaranty of their deposits in our banks, and seek preferential consideration for themselves, why should we not secure protection for the depositor? [Applause.]

This bill will be instrumental in protecting and developing the small banks throughout our country. It will compel the Government and State banks to observe more rigidly the conduct of bankers, and see that only those who are well-qualified by training, education, and culture in banking shall be permitted to run the banks of our country, instead of allowing the irresponsible and indiscreet people who are not conversant with banking to engage in that profession.

Out of 8,000 banks that failed, five out of six were State banks. That shows that national banks give greater security and protection to their depositors than do State banks. That is due chiefly to the fact that there are 48 different kinds of laws in the various States of our Union. State banks have wider latitude in loans they are permitted to give. Politics enters more in the extension of credit in State banks than in national banks.

If I had my way, there would be only one banking system, and that is a national banking system, to which all banks could belong and in which all laws would be uniform, and the scales of justice would balance fairly and squarely to all those who were members of this system.

The passage of this bill, therefore, would be instrumental in encouraging the organization and development of banks by making investments in banking stock more attractive. It would provide a stricter method of examination, better management, and, above all, protect every dollar of every depositor in every bank throughout the United States.

In order to remove the great loss of confidence that has spread like wildfire throughout the United States against the banking system of our Republic, this fear could easily be removed by guaranteeing to every depositor that his money would be safeguarded, that his home would be protected, and that his life's savings would be conserved, and that business would not have to worry, when engaged in commerce, industry, or agriculture, that its money would be dissipated through the indiscretion of those who have been controlling our funds in the banks of the United States.

Let us therefore restore business, agriculture, commerce, and public confidence by passing the Steagall bank guaranty bill, which, in my opinion, is one of the most constructive, liberal, and progressive measures that has ever been brought before the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SECTION 1. The first sentence of section 5138 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 12, sec. 51), is amended by striking out "and except that such associations with a capital of not less than $25,000 may, with the sanction of the Secretary of the Treasury, be organized in any place the population of which does not exceed 3,000 inhabitants" and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "and except that associations formed for the purpose of succeeding to the business of an existing bank may, in the discretion of the Comptroller of the Currency, be organized with a less capital than $50,000 but not less than $25,000."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 2, line 4, after the word "bank," insert "in any such place where the population does not exceed 6,000."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I am trying to carry out with this amendment what I believe to be the intention of the committee. I take it it is not the intention of the committee to authorize the Comptroller of the Currency to have banks of less than $50,000 capital but not less than $25,000 capital in larger places than places of 6,000 inhabitants. You certainly would not authorize a State bank in the city of Milwaukee, an existing bank with a capital, say, of $25,000, to be changed into a national bank, which would be authorized under this phraseology. The purpose of the committee, as I understand it, is that as you are now seeking to make $50,000 the minimum capital for all national banks you recognize that where associations are already formed they may in case the capital is less than $50,000 but above $25,000 be converted into national banks.

Yet, under the phraseology as written in the bill, the Comptroller of the Currency could authorize a bank of $25,000 capital in a city above 6,000 inhabitants. My amendment is purely corrective, to carry out the intention of the committee.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, there is no objection to the gentleman's amendment. It is simply an enlargement of the language which may possibly make it more definite than the language of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I invite the attention of the Members to the fact that this is a bill which will permit the use of or the farming out of the credit of the Nation to private banks forever, without payment of compensation. That is the big question that is involved in this bill. With the question of guaranteeing bank deposits naturally we are all sympathetic. We want to guarantee bank deposits, but that is not the big question involved in this bill. I have before me a copy of the National Monetary Commission's report, filed January 9, 1912. The National Monetary Commission recommends that a system be set up which is similar to the present Federal reserve system.

That commission was composed of men like Senator Aldrich, Mr. Vreeland, Senator Penrose, and the assistant to the commission was our distinguished colleague from Massachusetts, Mr. ANDREW. In recommending that a Federal system be established the commission made this recommendation:

We propose that the important privilege of note issue shall be accorded to the principal financial agent of the Government, to be exercised under Government control and supervision, with restrictions and limitations of such character as will in our judgment make undue inflation impossible. All profits which may arise from note issues will be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

There is a principle involved in this bill. Are you going to permit the Government to issue money, currency, a circulating obligation, and give it to the bankers and let them use it for their own private use and benefit and not pay one penny of compensation to the Government of the United States? If these gentlemen want to put the Democratic Party on record as indorsing any such proposal as that, it is all right with me, but I do not believe the Democrats of this Nation are in favor of the Democratic Party indorsing the principle of farming out to the private bankers of this Nation that great privilege, that franchise that is worth millions of dollars, which will be perpetual to the private bankers of the Nation.

Mr. SIROVICH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. I can not yield; I have only five minutes. I invite attention to the fact that a Federal reserve note that is issued by the Federal reserve agent, who is the agent of the Government, is turned over to the Federal reserve bank without charge now, and why? With the expectation that there will be a surplus of earnings, and that the surplus earnings will be turned over into the Treasury of the United States as a franchise tax; but under this bill you are repealing that clause; you are saying that the Government of the United States is not entitled to a franchise tax, and that the credit of our Nation can be used without the payment of one penny. Let us take a $5 Federal reserve note and analyze it and see what it is, and why it was issued and for what purpose.

It does not read that the Federal reserve bank will pay $5, but it reads that the United States Government will pay the bearer $5 in gold on demand. How did that note come into existence? The Federal reserve bank delivered to the Federal reserve agent 40 cents in gold for every dollar, and the balance in eligible paper. Now, on the 40 cents no compensation should be paid, because it is covered in gold; but you are using the credit of the Nation for 60 per cent of that money. Are you going to let the bankers use it and not pay a penny of compensation for that use? That is the great principle involved in this bill, and if you are going to wreck the Democratic Party, I think you have taken a splendid step in that direction.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

I believe the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] wholly misinterprets the situation. In the first place, the Federal reserve banks are required to exact of the member banks certain deposits, certain reserves, so to speak—7 per cent, 10 per cent, 13 per cent, and so forth—depending on the location of the bank. That money is kept without interest by the Federal reserve system, and it really should inure to the benefit of the several banks who have been compelled to put up that deposit with the Federal reserve bank. The use of the credit of the United States does not impair the Nation's credit and it does not cost the people any particular amount of money.

I am not so very favorable to paying these earnings back to the banks, even as provided in this bill, but I believe the premise assumed by the gentleman from Texas based on statements of other gentlemen made prior to the enactment of the Federal reserve system, when they knew very little about this system, is erroneous. Those same gentlemen and those who followed after them have been managing our currency for the last 20 years, and they have not brought us to any good estate in their management. For that reason I would hesitate to follow that as an authority and as a precedent for taking any sort of position now, when people have been dealt with so poorly by those who advocated and set up and managed the banking system of this country. For that reason I do not wholly disagree with the gentleman from Texas as to what should be done with the earnings through the Federal reserve system. I think a portion of it should go into the Federal Treasury, but I think the gentleman's premise is entirely at fault, and that is the reason I took the floor.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman yield for a minute?

Mr. BUSBY. I do.

Mr. STEAGALL. I want to call attention to the fact that the leading men in the banking world, such men, for instance, as Governor Harding, who at first opposed every method to distribute the earnings of the Federal reserve banks among member banks, finally came to the conclusion, after the accumulation of an enormous surplus in the Federal reserve banks and after a large amount had been paid into the Treasury of the United States in lieu of a franchise tax, that the members of the Federal reserve system should share in the earnings of the system. At the last meeting of the board of directors of the Boston bank, prior to the death of Mr. W. P. G. Harding, a resolution was passed indorsing the proposition embodied in a bill that I had introduced before the Committee on Banking and Currency, which provided for a distribution of the earnings of the Federal reserve banks to their member banks.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. (a) Section 5138 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 12, sec. 51), is amended by adding the following new sentence: "No association shall be organized unless with a surplus (hereinafter called initial surplus) of not less than an amount equal to 10 per cent of its capital stock."

(b) Section 5168 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 12, sec. 26) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5168. Whenever a certificate is transmitted to the Comptroller of the Currency, as provided in this title, and the association transmitting the same notifies the comptroller that at least 50 per cent of its capital stock and that at least 50 per cent of its initial surplus has been duly paid in, and that such association has complied with all the provisions of this title required to be complied with before an association shall be authorized to commence the business of banking, the comptroller shall examine into the conditions of such association, ascertain especially the amount of money paid in on account of its capital and on account of its initial surplus, the name and place of residence of each of its directors, and the amount of the capital stock of which each is the owner in good faith, and generally whether such association has complied with all the provisions of this title required to entitle it to engage in the business of banking; and shall cause to be made and attested by the oaths of a majority of the directors, and by the president or cashier of the association, a statement of all the facts necessary to enable the comptroller to determine whether the association is lawfully entitled to commence the business of banking."

(c) The first proviso of section 1 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the consolidation of national banking associations," approved November 7, 1918 (U. S. C., title 12, sec. 33), is amended to read as follows: "Provided, That the capital stock and initial surplus of such consolidated association shall be not less than that required under existing law for the organization of a national bank in the place in which it is located."

(d) That portion of the second sentence of section 3 of such act of November 7, 1918, as amended (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 12, sec. 34a), before the semicolon in such sentence is amended to read as follows: "The capital stock and initial surplus of such consolidated association shall not be less than that required under existing law for the organization of a national banking association in the place in which such consolidated association is located."

(e) Section 5154 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U. S. C., title 12, sec. 35), is amended by adding after the first proviso the following: " : Provided, That the initial surplus of such association shall be not less than that required under existing law for the organization of a national banking association in the place in which such association is located."

(f) Section 5140 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 12, sec. 53) is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5140. At least 50 per cent of the capital stock and at least 50 per cent of the initial surplus of every association shall be paid in before it shall be authorized to commence business, and the remainder of the capital stock and initial surplus shall be paid in installments of at least 10 per cent each, on the whole amount of the capital and initial surplus, as frequently as one installment at the end of each succeeding month from the time it shall be authorized by the Comptroller of the Currency to commence business; and the payment of each installment shall be certified to the comptroller under oath by the president or cashier of the association."

(g) The first two sentences of section 5141 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 12, sec. 54) are amended to read as follows: "Whenever any shareholder, or his assignee, fails to pay any installment on the stock or on the initial surplus when the same is required by the preceding section to be paid, the directors of such association may sell the stock of such delinquent shareholder at public auction, having given three weeks' previous notice thereof in a newspaper published and of general circulation in the city or county where the association is located, or, if no newspaper is published in said city or county, then in a newspaper published nearest thereto, to any person who will pay the highest price therefor, to be not less than the amount then due thereon (including amounts due from such shareholder with respect to initial surplus), with the expenses of advertisement and sale; and the excess, if any, shall be paid to the delinquent shareholder. If no bidder can be found who will pay for such stock the amount due thereon (including amounts due from such shareholder with respect to initial surplus) to the association, and the cost of advertisement and sale, the amount previously paid shall be forfeited to the association, and such stock shall be sold as the directors may order within six months from the time of such forfeiture and if not sold it shall be canceled and deducted from the capital stock of the association."

(h) The first two sentences of section 5205 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U. S. C., title 12, sec. 55), are amended to read as follows: "Every association which shall have failed to pay up its capital stock or initial surplus, as required by law, and every association whose capital stock shall have become impaired by losses or otherwise, shall, within three months after receiving notice thereof from the Comptroller of the Currency, pay the deficiency in the capital stock and initial surplus, by assessment upon the shareholders pro rata for the amount of capital stock held by each; and the Treasurer of the United States shall withhold the interest upon all bonds held by him in trust for any such association, upon notification from the Comptroller of the Currency, until otherwise notified by him. If any such association shall fail to pay up its capital stock and initial surplus, and shall refuse to go into liquidation, as provided by law, for three months after receiving notice from the comptroller, a receiver may be appointed to close up the business of the association, according to the provisions of section 5234."

(i) That part of section 5143 of the Revised Statutes, as amended (U. S. C., title 12, sec. 59), before the semicolon is amended to read as follows: "Any association formed under this title may, by the vote of shareholders owning two-thirds of its capital stock, reduce its capital and surplus to any sum not below the amount required by existing law to authorize the formation of associations."

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, after 25 years of actual practical experience as the executive head of a successful small national banking association, I want to open my remarks by making this statement, and it is a statement that will no doubt be astonishing to some of the Members of the House. It is this: Not a dollar has ever been placed in the coffers of the Federal reserve banks in the United States but what came directly from the deposits of member banks, and that includes the capital stock of the Federal reserve banks. Every dollar of earnings of the Federal reserve system has been made out of deposits member banks have been required to make, without regard to their desire to do it, and without payment of a cent of interest to the member banks by the reserve bank.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Does the gentleman know the Federal reserve banks have issued $2,700,000,000 in currency and they are using that to go out on the open market to buy bonds and that they earn from that as much as they do from deposits?

Mr. MAY. Yes; and every dollar of money used to buy the bonds comes from deposits made by member banks in the proportion of 7 per cent of their time deposits and 3 per cent of their checking deposits.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Their circulation by the issuance of money is more than the deposits.

Mr. MAY. Yes; based on reserves they built up out of moneys contributed to them by member banks throughout the country.

Every dollar that is proposed to be placed here as a fund to guarantee deposits is money which came from the member banks of the country.

The bill is designed to serve two purposes, one of which is sufficient if it does nothing else than stabilize by creating confidence in the minds of the people of the country whose money is in the banks of the country. About 1896 I used to hear my Republican friends talking about the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 and talking about confidence in the integrity of the money of the country. I want to tell my colleague, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JENKINS] that confidence is the most important thing in the country to-day.

You talk about bank deposits! If the people of the country, the farmer, the merchant, the workman, the doctor, the lawyer can go to sleep at night conscious of the fact their money is safe in the bank and that it will be returned even at the expense of the United States Government, they are not going to get up the next morning and rush to the bank before sunup and create a run on the bank.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. Then why not let the Federal Government do all the banking business and open a bank in every post office? If that is done, the people will sleep still better.

Mr. MAY. The Federal Government is not engaged in the banking business. That brings me around to answering the proposition propounded by my amiable friend from Texas, when he wanted to know if the Democratic Party was going to put itself on record as favoring this measure, and he was reading from a document promulgated by the disciples of Alexander Hamilton, at a time when men like Woodrow Wilson, CARTER GLASS, and William J. Bryan were propounding measures to create the great Federal reserve system, contrary to the central-bank idea.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman has misstated my position. I said, Will the Democratic Party put itself on record as being in favor of giving the credit of this Nation to private bankers to use for their own benefit without compensation? That is what I said. Does the gentleman favor it?

Mr. MAY. I favor this: I favor this country and this Government giving its credit rather than going into the banking business and making itself liable. Every time it issues Federal reserve notes for 40 per cent gold it puts 60 per cent of its credit behind it.

Mr. STEVENSON. One hundred per cent.

Mr. MAY. One hundred per cent, because it stands sponsor for it.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAY. When you talk about the credit of the Government, I am just one of that kind of Jeffersonian Democrats who believe that it is better to use the credit of the Government and keep the Government out of the banking business than it is to put the Government in the banking business, either in the form of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or in any other way. There are only two or three things which make banking dangerous in this country, and that is the danger of infidelity and incompetency from the inside, to begin with, and, second, lack of confidence on the part of the public on the outside. The reason why we have had 2,397 bank failures since October, 1929, up to the first day of 1932 is because of the lack of confidence on the part of the public in the stability of our banks.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. Yes.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Is not the argument in favor of this bill—to put the Government in the insurance business at an insufficient premium—to guarantee or insure bank deposits? Is not that the argument here?

Mr. MAY. That is the natural argument, and that is a perfect argument in reference to this bill. But the biggest thing which this does is that, in addition to saying that the Government is going to guarantee these bank deposits, it is provided in this bill that the banks which become members of the system—and they will all become members of it under the provisions of this bill—shall be supervised by this board, and that the supervision shall be strict. Therefore it will bring back to the banks close, conservative, careful, and systematic management of their assets when we have this Federal board regulation.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAY. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. Am I to infer from what the gentleman says in regard to supervision that it will be better supervision than now exists under the Government through the office of the Comptroller of the Currency and through the Federal Reserve Board?

Mr. MAY. I should think it would be better, because when this bill becomes a law the entire banking system of the United States will become a part of this system and will, so far as guaranty of deposits is concerned only, be two institutions, one that of State banks and the other that of national banks, but the State banks which become members of the system will come directly under protection of the Federal Government through the guaranty of deposits.

Mr. McFADDEN. Then, do I understand the gentleman's argument to be that all State banks will come into the Federal reserve system, and that we will have a unified system?

Mr. MAY. My impression about it is that as a result of this legislation we will not have a unified system of banking in this country, and it will not be a branch-banking system but will have the benefit of Government backing.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. MAY. Yes.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I understood the gentleman to state that he has had banking experience?

Mr. MAY. Yes.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Is it not true that a part of this lack of confidence is due to the examinations of the Comptroller of the Currency?

Mr. MAY. The Federal reserve system during the last two or three years, since this orgy of speculation has been in vogue, has induced member banks to buy thousands and millions and hundreds of millions of dollars of practically worthless securities; but that time has passed, and nobody is buying any of these securities that have been recommended or may be recommended by the Federal reserve banks again.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Let me ask it in another way. Is not the fear caused in the banks themselves and then spread to the people because of the result that may come about on the next visit of the examiner from the Comptroller's office and the values which he may place on the securities in the banks? Is not that wherein the fear comes?

Mr. MAY. I think the fear comes chiefly from the situation in which the country finds itself, but, of course, there are instances, I suppose, where some bank examiners have abused their authority to the extent that it has become embarrassing to the bank under examination, and in some instances, no doubt through improper methods of bank examiners, banks have been embarrassed to the extent that heavy withdrawals of deposits have been made, and that is one of the very evils this law is designed to cure. If the bank under investigation had the fact of guaranty of its deposits generally known in the community, nothing the examiner might do or say would create any disturbance, because his visit would only add confidence to the situation. His presence would merely emphasize the Government's participation in the affairs of the bank.

If a bank fails in one community, it naturally creates alarm in the adjoining community. If a bank fails on one corner of the street in a town, it is liable to cause a run on the bank on the opposite corner of the street regardless of its stability, and these runs will close up a solvent bank just as quickly as they will close up an insolvent bank. I dare say that out of the 2,394 banks that have closed in the last two years, 90 per cent have been closed as a result of lack of confidence in the stability of the bank. If this bill becomes a law, this state of fear will be a thing of the past, and hundreds of millions of dollars now in hoarding would come out of hiding and be available for loan to legitimate business.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. Chairman, if I felt this bill, as the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] has stated, could rescue us from the hole we are in now, I would vote for it, but I can not for the life of me perceive how this bill will have any such effect. On the contrary, I think it will dig deeper the hole we are in now.

It has been said this bill will prevent banks from closing. I defy anyone in this Chamber to point out any State where the guaranty of bank deposits saved any bank from going under. On the contrary, look at the record, for example, in the State of Nebraska. Read the case that is cited in the report of the Committee on Banking and Currency, Abie State Bank against Bryan, Two hundred and eighty-two United States Reports, at page 770. The guaranty fund saved no bank. On the contrary, it embarrassed and hurt all the good, strong banks. Here is an extract from the Supreme Court decision, Abie State Bank against Bryan, showing the disastrous effect of the guaranty law in the State of Nebraska—the record is the same in all other States that tried the scheme.

The district court reviewed the results of the operations of the banks in Nebraska under the bank guaranty law. It appeared that there were 1,012 banks in the State (of Nebraska) in November, 1920, and that the number had been reduced to 726 in December, 1928; that these banks had a total capital of $19,001,000 and a total capital and surplus of $24,958,557.62; that for the period of 18 months preceding June 30, 1928, 750 banks had net earnings and 156 had net deficits; that the total net earnings of both groups for that period amounted to $1,935,519.40, or 7.9 per cent of the total capital and surplus; that during the same period these banks had paid into the depositors' guaranty fund $2,412,324.78, more than the earnings. It also appeared from the testimony of the secretary of the guaranty fund commission (as stated by the supreme court of the State) that up to December 31, 1928, 269 State banks had been closed by the State and placed in the hands of the commission, and that the total amount of the adjudicated claims was $10,536,518.59, exclusive of interest; and that in 72 State banks, then being operated as going concerns, the amount due depositors was $13,726,441.26, and the total amount due depositors in banks which were in receiverships but whose claims were not yet adjudicated, was $2,133,627.54. The total claims, including both claims adjudicated and those not adjudicated, or then existing liabilities against the guaranty fund, amounted to $26,400,282.76, and the total amount of assets to be realized would be $10,451,932.65, leaving a deficit of $15,948,350.11. The court concluded that "fully two-thirds of the banks under the existing financial conditions are unable, after paying assessments amounting to 8 per cent of their capital, to pay compensatory dividends," and that the bank guaranty law, as originally conceived, was "no longer serving its purposes."

So burdensome had the law become in Nebraska that it was finally repealed and the scheme of bank-deposit guaranty was abandoned. The fund was liquidated. The depositors, whose deposits were supposedly guaranteed, never will be paid in full.

Instead of rescuing banks, especially small State banks, this proposal would plunge them deeper and deeper in the abyss of difficulty; and how under the sun it is going to prevent the failure of banks on a nation-wide scale is beyond me.

We know that banks are not failing now. We have arrested the failure of banks. The measures that we have provided, including the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill and the last Steagall bill, have been doing what we anticipated they would do, namely, offer plenty of liquidity to banks to remove the fear of runs. Furthermore, the policy of the Federal reserve system of open-market transactions which has been indulged in to the extent of almost $100,000,000 during some weeks, will also, I am quite sure, fundamentally change the situation for the better. In fact, signs of improvement along these lines are seen. The Federal reserve in bidding in the open market for Government securities are forcing banks to open their portfolios and to divest themselves of the Government securities in return for the cash the Federal reserve offers. Such practice makes banks more liquid and undoubtedly will force banks to loan out their cash funds.

Give these measures an opportunity to work their course instead of rushing in pell-mell with the Goldsborough bill and now with this bill.

This will take $150,000,000 out of the surplus of the Federal reserve banks. I tell you, gentlemen, the system can not stand this depletion, because the capital of the Federal reserve banks is only $159,060,000. This is as of January 31, 1932. The surplus to-day has been reduced as of that date to $259,420,262. Its earnings for the last calendar year was about $3,000,000. Now, out of the $259,420,262 you propose to take $150,000,000.

The Federal reserve system is not an inexhaustible gold mine where you can constantly dip your hand in and take out money. Even it has its limitations. You must remember that the peoples of Europe and of South America and the rest of the world look upon the Federal reserve banks as we look upon the Bank of England or the Bank of France. It is our central bank. Now you propose to deplete the surplus of that central bank by almost 50 per cent. What is going to happen? England and France will misunderstand your action. There will be more of a flight from the dollar. There will be more gold removed from this country and taken away from us, because they will fear for the financial stability of our central banking institution, the Federal reserve system. You can not so drastically reduce the surplus of any financial organization 50 per cent without shaking the confidence of its customers.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. MAY. The gentleman from New York has spoken of the stopping of bank failures in this country by the enactment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation law. Does not the gentleman think that is due to the fact the public generally understands that the United States Government has sponsored that movement?

Mr. CELLER. That may be so, but I say we have gone far enough in that regard. If, for example, we have stopped the plunge of banks into insolvency by runs being made upon them by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, why should we go any further? Therefore I am impatient with the argument that this bill will stop such bank failures. They have already stopped, and there is no need to proceed further.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. There is another matter here that we must not lose sight of, because the figures stare us right in the face. During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1931, the total amount of deposits in failed banks, member banks, and nonmember banks, was $1,759,884,000. Of this amount the member banks had in their treasuries $776,000,000 and the nonmember banks $983,000,000. The testimony shows that only 50 per cent, or thereabouts, is usually salvaged in the liquidated banks. Dividing in half the $1,759,884,000 in the failed banks and supposing that all the banks had come under this guaranty fund, and figuring that only 50 per cent would be salvaged, there would have had to come out of the guaranty fund, supposing we had the scheme in operation before the present panic, over $870,000,000. Your initial fund in this bill is $500,000,000. Where would the balance come from except from your pocket and my pocket; that is, from the taxpayers.

If we want to go farther and say this is an exaggerated case, I am quite sure we can take the situation where we only have the member banks failing. There was in the member banks deposits of $776,000,000, which would mean that the guaranty fund, if it were faced with a similar situation, would have to pay out $388,000,000; that is, half the amount of deposits. You would have exhausted almost all the fund immediately, presuming again that the scheme were in operation before the present depression or panic. I hope the committee will vote down this bill.

Mr. GILBERT. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have one minute more in order to answer the question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILBERT. As a matter of fact, upon what does the gentleman base his statement that we have stopped the failure of banks? I have information that two have failed in my community during the last week.

Mr. CELLER. Some banks are failing, but I think it is the common opinion, and the Comptroller of the Currency so states, that the banks in general have stopped failing. There has always been a small number of banks failing, even in times of prosperity, but they are in small numbers. The number of banks failing has been appreciably diminished, and I would say that, in general, banks have stopped failing all over the country.

Mr. GILBERT. Has the gentleman any statistical information of that fact?

Mr. CELLER. I have. But you can easily consult the office of Comptroller of the Currency for verification.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes, 5 minutes, out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. REILLY. Mr. Chairman, this House is confronted with a condition and not a theory in the discussion of the pending bill providing for the guaranteeing of bank deposits.

As I have listened to the debates on this bill I am reminded of the debates on the Federal reserve act in this House in 1913, when it was my privilege to serve in this body. The arguments that we have heard to-day that this bill is unsound in principle, that it penalizes the careful and efficient banker, that it will lead to more reckless banking, and that it simply will not work were all eloquently and forcibly urged against the Federal reserve system, now declared by friend and foe alike to be a great piece of constructive financial legislation.

The Federal reserve act was passed because of the Wall Street panic of 1907, which resulted in a serious business disturbance and great financial losses to the citizenship and to the industry of our country. When the people learned that our bank reserves were all pyramided up in Wall Street and used as call money on the stock market, and that when Wall Street had a panic the rest of the country would have to have a panic, a demand went forth to completely sever the connections between Wall Street and our banking system, and the result was the Federal reserve banking law.

For the 10½ years prior to June 30, 1931, about 8,000 banks in the country have suspended, resulting in the tieing up of hundreds of millions of dollars of assets with great inconvenience and losses to the depositors, with the unfortunate result that the people have lost confidence in even our surviving sound banks.

Of course the large percentage of banks that failed in this period were small banks having a capital stock of $25,000 or less. This class of banks constitutes 60 per cent of the bank failures in said period, while banks having less than $50,000 capital stock represent 70 per cent of the total bank failures of the past 10 years, and banks having less than $100,000 capital represent 60 per cent of the total bank failures. During the year 1931, 369 national banks closed their doors and 1,324 State banks failed. This record represents an increase of almost 300 per cent over the banking casualties of 1930. However, quite a few of these closed banks, both State and National, were reorganized without any loss to the depositors.

Experience has proven that banks with a small capital stock can not weather depressions for the simple reason that their profits are not sufficiently large to permit them to write off losses.

The pending bill provides for increasing the capital stock of national banks to a minimum capital stock of $50,000, and it also provides for the building up of a surplus or reserve fund by limiting the dividends on stock until the reserve equals the amount of capital stock. These provisions in this bill constitute constructive banking legislation and will lessen bank failures.

The pending measure also provides for the extending of the guaranteeing provision of this bill to State banks not members of the Federal reserve system, providing such institutions desire to avail themselves of the privileges of this law.

We are now at another crossroad in our banking history. The present industrial depression has brought home to the country most forcibly the fact that there is something radically wrong with our banking system. Any student of the present industrial situation can not help but arrive at the conclusion that our banking system is the one sore spot in our industrial life to-day.

Our banks to-day are not ministering to the legitimate loaning demands of industry. Because of the number of bank failures that have taken place in the past three years, many people have lost confidence in the safety of our banking institutions, with the result that there have been enormous banking withdrawals, that have resulted in closing many banks that were sound, and never should have been closed, and also in the tightening of bank credits.

The best-managed bank in the world can not stand a continual drain on its resources by withdrawing depositors. The bankers are not to blame that they have tightened up on credits. Because of this feeling on the part of many people that the banks are not safe, all banks have to keep liquid as a matter of self-preservation.

The bankers of our country, to a large extent, during the past two years have been more concerned about the safety requirements of their own institutions than about the legitimate loan demands of trade and industry. The fact of the matter is the banking situation in our country has greatly accentuated our industrial depression. If confidence in our banking institutions could be restored, if the hoarded millions could be restored to the custody of the banks, and the bankers could be relieved of the fear of runs and withdrawals, it is believed that industry and commerce would take on a new life and that our country would be on the way out of our nightmare of industrial stagnation and ruin.

When the Government of the United States puts money in a national bank, a national bank that it has a right to inspect, it requires a bond for the return of the money. When State governments put money in their State banks the same requirements are laid down. When our cities and municipalities deposit in banks they demand security for the return of their money. Then why should our citizens be asked to put money into banks without any security or assurance that it will be returned to them when they need it?

When the Federal reserve banking act passed the United States Senate in 1913 it contained a provision for using the profits of the bank to liquidate the liabilities of failed banks. This provision was omitted from the House bill and went out of the Senate bill in conference for the reason that it was claimed the Federal reserve system was not intended or expected to make any profits.

The history of the Federal reserve system shows that these views were wrong. The Federal reserve system has made profit since its organization in excess of over $500,000,000. There is at the present time more than $250,000,000 of surplus in the Federal reserve system, notwithstanding the fact that the system has paid $150,000,000 to the Government as a franchise tax and about $100,000,000 in the erection of palatial bank buildings.

If the Federal reserve law had carried a provision for the use of the profits of the system as a fund to pay depositors in full in closed national banks and member banks of the system, that sum, together with the interest losses to these banks since 1929 because of the huge sums retained in bank vaults in order for the banks to remain liquid—which would amount to hundreds of millions of dollars—would more than pay all losses to depositors in the Federal reserve system to date.

Many National and State banks have failed in the past three years that never should have failed. These banks were soundly managed, but because of the failure of banks that were not wisely managed, banks that were the victims of dishonest acts of their officials, a loss of confidence in the safety of all banking institutions has resulted in the gradual withdrawals of deposits from sound banking institutions and compelled many of these banks to close their doors and to be listed on the roll of bank failures in order that the balance of the depositors might be protected.

Our banking system constitutes the heart of our industrial life—a heart that pumps money, the lifeblood of industry and trade, through the arteries of commerce and must be kept a sound and efficient organism if our country is to continue to avoid industrial depression such as we are now experiencing. We are doing business to-day more than ever not on money, but on credit and our industrial plight to-day is largely due to the destruction of confidence in credit in the business world.

I am not for the pending bill providing for the guaranteeing of bank deposits simply because it will prevent losses to the depositors, but I am for the bill because it will prevent losses and disaster to the business and industrial world. The business and industrial world can not operate efficiently unless properly served by the banking institutions.

When the depositors began to lose their life savings in closed banks confidence in the safety of banks waned and at that same moment the ability of the banks to serve the business world began to decline. A failed bank means not only a loss to the depositors but it also means a loss of confidence in our banking system that eventually means a tightening up of the loaning privileges of the banks, and it means the paralysis of industry.

We will never get our country back on the highway of economic recovery until we can restore confidence in the soundness of our banks, and thereby relieve the bankers of the fear of bank withdrawals either hurriedly or through a more extended period of time.

This bill will help the bankers of the country—I mean the great majority of the legitimate commercial bankers of the country, the honest bankers, who are interested in running safe and serviceable banking institutions.

It is my pleasure to represent in part on the floor of this House, a State that has an enviable record from the standpoint of sound and safe banking. If all the States of the Union had the same banking record as Wisconsin has, we would have had no such industrial depression as we are experiencing to-day.

Of the 1,345 banks that failed in the United States in 1930, there were only 24 of that number which occurred in Wisconsin, and of these 24, 12 were reopened without any loss to depositors. However, notwithstanding this banking record for Wisconsin, reports are that it is just as difficult for the business world and the legitimate borrowers to get money from the banks in Wisconsin as almost any other State in the Union.

The bank failures throughout the country and not of an individual State are what wreck confidence in our banking institutions and paralyze the lending hand of the banker.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REILLY. Yes.

Mr. MAY. What does the gentleman think of the idea of the hoarded cash there is in the country, what will happen to it after this bill passes?

Mr. REILLY. The hoarding of cash or money to-day has reached a serious situation. No one appears to be able to estimate just how much money has been withdrawn from the banks and hoarded, but it undoubtedly represents a huge sum, probably $1,500,000,000. This withdrawing of so large a sum of money from our banks at this time has seriously contracted the credit of the country. There can be no doubt at all, but that if this bill should become a law money would come out of hiding and there would be no incentive then to hoard money for the reason that all depositors would understand that their money was safe in the banks.

Even in prosperous times there is a great deal of money hoarded by the people who because of their past experiences distrust our banks.

The passage of this bill will not promote reckless banking. Every banker will have at stake his reputation, his own investments in the stocks of the bank and in the investments of his friends and he will have every incentive to pursue a sound and safe banking policy.

The fact of the matter is that we have had too many banks in this country and it has been too easy to become a banker. In my State of Wisconsin, if one of our citizens desires to become a barber or a plumber or in fact to enter upon any line of industrial or professional activity, he must pass an examination and obtain a license to pursue a particular trade.

The same situation exists in many other States in this Union, while anybody can become a banker and engage in the business of handling bank deposits and of contributing through inefficiency as a banker to destroying the confidence of the people in the banking institutions of the country.

This bill does not unjustly or unreasonably penalize the efficient banker.

The Federal reserve system penalizes the efficient banker. Under the Federal reserve system the bankers of the country, the efficient as well as the inefficient, are obliged to keep $2,000,000,000 on deposit with the Federal reserve bank, on which they draw no interest. Under the old system they were privileged to draw from 2 to 3 per cent on such deposits, but in the interests of the whole business world it was decreed by law that the careful bankers should be penalized to the extent of being deprived of that interest income in order that our banking system might be made safer.

Almost every law that is written upon the statute books of our country penalizes somebody. Our life-insurance premiums are higher than they should be because of the reckless lives that some people live. Our fire-insurance premiums are higher than they should be because of dishonesty and carelessness on the part of some of our citizens who carry property insurance. So it is all through our industrial and official life. The honest and the efficient citizen and business man is penalized for the faults and shortcomings of others of his fellow citizens.

As I have said, the banking business constitutes the most vital business of all our industrial institutions, and it must be made safe and sound if we are going to continue to do business in this country on checks and credit.

Under a system of guaranteeing of bank deposits the bankers themselves will be interested in the efficiency and honesty of their banking brothers. They will have an inspection system all their own in each Federal reserve district, an inspection system that will be based upon careful inspection and free from politics and pull. Under such a system many of the bank failures that have occurred in the past, that were the result of inside jobs, would have been prevented.

Just as soon as the bankers of this country become responsible for the workings of an efficient banking system, the bankers will devise a system of inspection and checking up that will make impossible bank failures such as we have had, and the cost to the bankers will amount to only a fraction of 1 per cent a year charge upon the banking resources of the country, in order to liquidate in full all losses to depositors.

Congress and the country must look to the bankers, not the big bankers, not the speculative bankers, not the exploiting bankers, but to the commercial bankers, who are satisfied to run safe and conservative banks for the purpose of serving industry and commerce and the legitimate banking demands of their respective communities, for assistance and guidance in solving the important and pressing problem of furnishing our country with a banking system that can function as efficiently in times of industrial depression as in periods of business prosperity. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. I want the attention of the members of the Banking Committee in particular to suggest for their consideration that before the bill is enacted into law, as there is plenty of time to amend, to consider the advisability of writing a provision in the bill further limiting the amount that a bank may loan. There is no reason why a bank capitalized at $50,000 or $100,000 should be permitted to loan money beyond its ability to meet upon call. In other words, the practice at least in some States has been that a bank may loan almost an unlimited amount; this is the case with many State banks. The banking laws of some States are not strong. We need Federal laws for Federal banks which our State laws may well follow.

Another provision I believe the committee should consider is the further criminal liability of the officers of any bank that may close its doors.

If bank officials were sure of criminal punishment in case their bank closed, then they would be more careful in the making of loans that are not properly secured. No; I am not charging all bank officials as being careless or dishonest; far from that; but if the penalty was certain, the sane and honest bankers would be protected. If such penalty was certain, fewer banks would close, and thus the life savings of our citizens would be protected against the weak and the dishonest. The argument that credit would be hampered is not sound because to-day credit is almost nonexistent. Credit would, in the long run, be extended and enlarged, and also deposits of innocent citizens would be safe. My friends, the American people are tired of seeing the banks close with their life's savings and we should protect them by more drastic laws.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

I was unable to make a connected statement a short time ago, and although I quoted from the National Monetary Commission's report, in which it was said that the Government should not permit the use of its credit without compensation, I intended to also quote from more recent authorities, but my time did not permit.

At this time I want to invite attention further to a letter which I mentioned earlier in the afternoon but was not privileged to read, and I want to at least read one paragraph of that letter.

This very question came up in 1920, as to whether the Federal reserve system should have the excess earnings. Back in 1916 the board met and, although section 16 of the Federal reserve act provides that when these notes are issued the Federal reserve bank shall pay the rate of interest as may be prescribed by the Federal Reserve Board, they decided that that rate of interest should not be assessed, because the excess earnings would go into the Treasury in any event, and there would be no occasion to assess interest charges when the notes were given to the Federal reserve banks.

Now, the question arises in this bill, Shall we give the Federal reserve banks all of their excess earnings? which, in truth and in fact, is nothing more than granting a perpetual franchise to those banks to use the credit of our Nation without any compensation whatever.

When this question came up in 1920, Mr. Harding, governor of the Federal Reserve Board, wrote to Mr. Edmund Platt, of the House, explaining a scheme he had in mind, which would have distributed the surplus belonging to the Government at the end of a certain period. To the member banks 45 per cent; Federal reserve banks, 5 per cent; to the Government 50 per cent. In other words, he was for giving one-half the Government surplus to the member banks. He said he had thought about this a great deal but had finally decided not to mention it to anyone. The day before this letter was written he had met Edmund Platt and Platt had brought up that very subject, that is, how to get more of the earnings for the member banks. Harding said it was a coincidence that both of them had been thinking about the same thing.

On February 7, 1920, Mr. Jay wrote to Platt proposing an amendment to the Federal reserve act, whereby the directors of the Federal reserve bank would be given the right to declare an extra dividend.

I will not read all of this statement I have prepared, but I want to read one paragraph from a letter from Mr. John H. Rich, of the Federal Reserve Bank at Minneapolis. It is dated February 13, 1920, to Mr. Jay, who was chairman of the Federal Reserve Bank of New York, and it reads:

Member banks enjoy four distinct sources of profit from a Federal reserve bank. The first is their dividend upon their capital stock, on which they receive a return of 6 per cent per annum. The second source of profit is represented by service which we give them for nothing. This represented, in the case of this bank last year, more than the equivalent of the 6 per cent dividend. Members enjoy a third source of profit from the spread between the Federal reserve bank discount rates and their own loan rates, and the aggregate of this profit in one year is by no means inconsiderable.

They enjoy a fourth profit, which in many cases that I have investigated, is more substantial than the dividend payment, lower reserves, and ability to increase their loanable funds. With four distinct sources of revenue available to them already, I can see no possible reason why we should deliberately give them more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. The distinguished chairman of the committee stated a while ago that Mr. W. P. G. Harding, who was chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, also advocated giving the excess reserves to the member banks.

I have made some investigation of that subject myself and I have been unable to find where Mr. Harding advocated that, except before February 13, 1920. When he took it up with the Federal reserve agents they convinced him that he was wrong, and on April 22, 1920, Mr. W. P. G. Harding, governor of the Federal Reserve Board, sent out a 7-page letter to the member banks, in which he said:

The desire of the member banks for a larger participation in the profits of the reserve institutions is quite general and perhaps not altogether unnatural. * * * The framers of the act did not contemplate that the Federal reserve banks should be essentially money-making institutions.

If this bill passes, it is making them money-making institutions. It provides sufficient incentive for them to be greedy in making money, because excess profits and all profits go back to the Federal reserve system and then are distributed to the member banks. The Federal reserve system was not established to make profit; but now you are trying to bring in a bill that will make it a profit-making institution by using the credit of the Nation free of charge, without one penny of compensation.

He states further:

The law expressly exempts Federal reserve banks from Federal, State, and local taxation, except upon real estate, and they are relieved of paying corporation income and excess-profits taxes.

I will skip over much of the letter and not read it all.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PATMAN. I yield for a short question.

Mr. MAY. The collections that member banks made prior to the rules adopted by the Federal reserve banks on items of cash exchange amounted, it has been stated, to 6 per cent interest on their capital stock.

Mr. PATMAN. That is not relevant here; I hope the gentleman will not press it. Each bank gets a benefit out of that.

Mr. MAY. What becomes of the money?

Mr. PATMAN. They lose money in some instances by rendering free service and make money in other instances by receiving the benefits of free services rendered by others.

Continuing to read:

Member banks should recognize the fact that earnings of Federal reserve banks are, therefore, derived very largely through the circulation of these notes. The Federal Reserve Board has the power under section 16—

Listen to this closely, for it is the section I reminded you of a while ago—has the power under section 16 of the Federal reserve act to impose an interest charge at such rate as it may deem expedient upon the Federal reserve banks for that portion of their notes in circulation not covered by gold or gold certificates.

I ask you to listen to this:

It is a rather close question—

I think he is wrong. I think it is a mandatory provision of the law, but he says:

It is a rather close question as to whether the board has any option in imposing an interest charge upon Federal reserve notes in circulation.

I want to ask the committee in all sincerity if they are going to bring in a bill to take the excess profits of the Federal reserve banks, they certainly should write into the Federal reserve law a provision about which there will be no doubt, that an interest rate shall be charged upon the circulating notes.

I shall not read the letter further except to say that Mr. Harding closes the letter by stating that if they further insist upon taking these profits he will insist upon imposing an interest charge.

That was back in 1920. Why change so quickly and so suddenly the policy of our Government of using the credit of our Nation?

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Now, let us see what the bill does. Where are all the Members of the House who have been talking about unbalancing the Budget? Every time a bill they oppose is brought up they say, "This will unbalance the Budget." Where are they now?

This bill does not in express language provide for an appropriation, but the language it does use amounts to an appropriation from the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. I call the gentleman's attention to page 19, section 211, where a specific appropriation is made.

Mr. PATMAN. I know; but what I mean is it does not give the amount and does not call it an appropriation. The amount is $147,126,882, if this bill passes, that you will take out of the Tresaury. It will not be taken out of a trust fund that has been set aside, because no such fund has been set aside. It will be taken out of the taxpayers' money and further unbalance this Budget you have been talking so much about. Five hundred million dollars more is appropriated in this bill; that is, permission is granted to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to advance to this guaranty board $500,000,000, and that is an advancement from the Treasury of the United States, because the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has already used its initial capital of $500,000,000; it has issued debentures of $200,000,000 more, I am reliably informed, and it could not sell those debentures readily, and under that act they had the right to go to the Treasury of the United States and get that money from the Treasury, which they did.

Under this bill you are giving them the further right to take $500,000,000 in debentures, go to the Treasury of the United States and get that much money. Where are all these Members who have been talking so much about the Budget? They are solicitous of the welfare of the Budget; here is a bill that appropriates $647,000,000. I now yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. HOWARD. I just wanted to ask the gentleman whether from the abundance of his knowledge he could tell the Members of this House whether or not that institution, known as the Federal reserve, is or is not secretly behind this legislation.

Mr. PATMAN. I do not know whether they are secretly behind it or not, but here is what I believe will happen if this bill passes. The big banks will get out of the Federal reserve system. The guaranty board will take this $647,000,000 of the people's money and use it for the insolvent banks, and then the guarantee part will be repealed. Then the big banks will come back in, and they will have this perpetual franchise to use the people's credit in order that they may make profits for themselves without paying one dime to the Government.

What is the profit of the Federal reserve system out of a dollar? They put up 40 cents in gold and 60 cents of credit of the Government of the United States. The Federal reserve system does not own that gold. That belongs to the depositors of the banks of this Nation. Therefore, they are not putting up a penny on earth, and are making all of these enormous profits, and do not even want to pay the Government of the United States a small interest charge for the issuance of these notes. The Federal reserve banks have a perpetual charter now, and if you pass this bill you give the perpetually chartered Federal reserve system the right to forever use the Government's credit without a penny of compensation. That is the point I want to emphasize.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the most momentous question of most vital importance to the people to-day is to make Americans secure in their money they deposit in banks. [Applause.] We must properly frame and pass this bill to-morrow to guarantee bank deposits. Our constituents have been ruined by the thousands everywhere through the failure of banks. Until you guarantee deposits there is not going to be any confidence in business any more.

I want to ask my friend from Colorado, who has been here a long time, this question: Suppose one of your constituents were to come to you to-day and say, "I have $10,000 that during our married life my wife and I have stinted ourselves to save. I want you to tell me where to put it, what bank I could put it in to be secure." What bank would the gentleman cite them to?

Mr. TIMBERLAKE. Postal savings.

Mr. BLANTON. That is the trouble. You put them into a Government business. They have a right to put their money in private banks and feel secure about it.

I want to say to my friend from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] that this is the only guaranty of deposits bill we are going to have before the Congress. If the bill is not proper or if there are defects in it, or if there are certain provisions in the bill which will have the bad effect he is fearful about, let us properly amend the bill under the 5-minute rule and whip the bill into shape and pass it and let our constituents know from now on that in national banks, at least, when they put their money there it is going to be secure and they can get it back.

If the State banks of Texas do not come in under this law and guarantee their deposits, let them go out of business. I would rather have them go out of business than ruin my constituents by closing their banks and causing them to lose their deposits. [Applause.]

Mr. GREEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield; but I have only five minutes.

Mr. GREEN. My question is right along that line. Does the gentleman believe any more banks would close if the officers of the bank knew they would get 10 years' imprisonment?

Mr. BLANTON. One prominent banker in my home city has been convicted. I know my friend from Alabama has worked hard, with the help of his committee, in trying to bring out a bill that will protect depositors. I have confidence in the gentleman, and if there is anything in the bill that does not protect the public, I know the gentleman will be pleased to have proper amendments offered from the floor to safeguard the interests of every American citizen in this land.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. I have prepared amendments to offer to the bill and I hope the gentleman will support them.

Mr. BLANTON. I shall support all proper amendments. I know my friend from Alabama well enough to know that he will be glad to have any amendment offered that will further safeguard the interests of the people. I am going to go along with him on this proposition, because it is the only thing that promises any safeguard for the interests of the depositors of the Nation. What else are you going to get for the people of this Nation? If you write your constituents, they will tell you that they want you to make bank deposits safe before you adjourn.

Banks have failed all over my country. In the city of Eastland, Tex., the county seat of one of the finest counties in the land, every bank in that city failed at one time and the people did not have any place to deposit their money or to draw a check. Banks have failed all over the South and everywhere else in the United States, and the time has come when we must make these deposits safe, and I am going along with the committee in an effort to do this.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask Members on my left what they are going to do when a bill comes before the House, sponsored by the President of the United States, providing for the use of funds that have been paid into the Treasury out of the earnings of the Federal reserve banks and the surplus of the Federal reserve banks for the benefit of depositors in closed banks? When this measure comes here are you going to follow the President of the United States or are you going to follow the gentleman from Pennsylvania? It is very likely you are going to face that question before the session ends and I want to call your attention to it now.

The Federal reserve banks get their money out of the deposits of member banks and out of the stock maintained in the Federal reserve banks by member banks.

I want to repeat that no man can contend that anyone has a moral right, whether it be all the people of the United States or an individual, to take the earnings of a bank and appropriate them as against the rights of the stockholders and the depositors in the bank who are the rightful owners of its assets. But this bill does not depend upon the mere use of $150,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States. We can pass a successful plan without this fund, though it of right belongs to the member banks of the Federal reserve system. We have an ample fund without resort to an appropriation out of the Treasury for use of funds that have been paid from the earnings of Federal reserve banks.

The records show that all the deposits involved in bank failures for 11 years—from 1921 to 1931, inclusive—amount to only $1,200,000,000 in round figures. We have in the records of the Banking and Currency Committee the testimony of the Comptroller of the Currency, who made the statement that history has shown that we collect in insolvent banks enough to pay depositors 88 per cent, leaving a loss of only 12 per cent. So we have an ample fund even without calling upon the Treasury, and it would not become necessary to assess banks after the initial fund has been collected. We merely give the right to assess $100,000,000 annually after the first $100,000,000 has been paid into this fund and provide for collections to be made in installments.

I want to say that we have found that deposits involved in bank failures in nonmember banks are less than the deposits involved in the failures of member banks, for the last 11 years, 1921 to 1931, inclusive. The record shows it. So, in view of this and in order to help carry the burden of protection for the depositors, the committee has prepared an amendment to be offered at the proper time which liberalizes the provision for admitting State banks to participation in the protection fund. All are to come in upon equal terms and with equal assessment.

This is what the figures show, notwithstanding there are twice as many nonmember as there are of member banks and nonmember banks had one and one-half times the amount of deposits that member banks had during the 11-year period——

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I have only a few minutes, as we must adjourn before 4 o'clock, but I yield.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I simply wanted to ask the gentleman this question: A number of States have passed guaranty laws and have afterwards repealed them because they did not work. Will the gentleman state the difference between those laws and this bill?

Mr. STEAGALL. If the gentleman will confer with Members who come from those States, for instance, Governor SHALLENBERGER, and the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS], or the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG], or other Members, they will explain it. As long as those laws worked successfully, they were ideal, but it was found that the funds affording protection were not large enough in such small units, where the risk was concentrated. It must be remembered, too, that those States were depending upon one crop—our banking supervision was new and wholly inadequate.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The reason I asked the question was because the banks are writing to us and citing these cases.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I yield.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. The guaranty laws in these States failed because the fund was not big enough to carry the load.

Mr. STEAGALL. That is true. Nobody argues that the fund provided for in this bill is not sufficient. The only argument is that we do not get it in the right way. The truth is we levy the burden on the banks themselves whose carelessness and irresponsibility made possible this horrible condition under which our people are suffering to-day.

Now, I want to call attention to something that some Members seem to have forgotten. This Congress has already passed a bill for the protection of the depositors in banks in the United States, and we took the money out of the Treasury of the United States, as the gentleman from Texas has just stated; and although we began with $2,000,000,000, we are now asked to open the Treasury again to save the situation. We passed that legislation at the instance, and upon the insistence, of the big bankers of the country, who are propagandizing the House and the country now and condemning as unsound the bill now before us, which places the protection burden on the banks themselves.

I deny the right of any Member of this House who voted for the $2,000,000,000 guaranty bill to vote against this measure, if he makes any claim to consistency. Ask any member of the Reconstruction Corporation Board if he thinks we were justified in using the Treasury of the United States to the extent of $2,000,000,000 for saving the banks of the country that were falling and paralyzing industry and agriculture and commerce in the United States. They will at once answer that the service rendered in preventing bank failures justifies that legislation. Their only boast is that bank failures have been ended. It was in every essence a guaranty measure. In fact, that was the justification for it. I deny the right of any Member of this House who voted for that bill to repudiate this bill, either in principle or as it will work out in practice.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And is it not true that along with that insistence and persistence to get that measure through they depicted a very dismal picture unless we did pass it?

Mr. STEAGALL. They told us stories of distress, not of little banks, referred to here so contemptuously, but of distress in the condition because of big banks. Our troubles have not arisen out of the difficulties of little banks so much as in the case of the big banks. The big bankers told us stories of distress that I was not at liberty to disclose. They now have their arms in the Treasury up to their shoulders and then come and talk to us about the principles of this bill being unsound. [Applause.]

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KVALE. Mr. Chairman, the statement I am about to make is made at the request of a hastily formed citizens' committee of this city of the most representative and all-inclusive character, which is deeply concerned over the prospect of wholesale suffering and misery which must almost surely result if published reports that a large number of ex-service men are soon to reach the city of Washington in the interest of adjusted-service certificate payment legislation prove to be true.

No one can challenge my position in respect to that legislation. I am for it now, and I shall continue to be for it; but after sitting yesterday afternoon in that earnest group which met with the District Commissioners and the superintendent of police, and after receiving from them this request, I voice their plea, and I think I have reasonable assurance that it is also the plea of this House, to those groups of veterans not to come here in the numbers planned but to turn back to their homes.

I make this appeal not only for the sake of the legislation which I have supported and in which they are interested, but also in the interest of the comrades who will be attracted to their group as they near Washington, and who may not be as strong as the strongest among the original groups. Unless climatic conditions are ideal many will suffer from exposure, because every available shelter is filled to capacity already. With every good intention in the world, municipal authorities and responsible citizens, welfare groups, and even the veterans' organizations themselves are powerless to finance or otherwise to provide food for any large group even for a short time. The leaders, whoever they are, are taking a terrible responsibility in bringing here under such conditions a group of men unable to provide for themselves.

What is worse, others are to be considered. Perhaps these veterans would revise their plans if they could know that because of these depleted welfare chests and municipal resources money spent to feed them will be taken from children and dependents upon these chests who are already undernourished and undersupplied with barest necessities.

The city, wrestling with a burden already too heavy, has sought to ease it by securing additional deficiency appropriations from Congress, not yet assured. Welfare workers are at their wits' end; in the name of these combined groups and for the reasons stated, I ask these veterans to stay away from Washington and not to descend as planned upon the city in large numbers.

It is not that the city is inhospitable. It is simply that funds are exhausted, welfare agencies are helpless in consequence, and responsible citizens and officials are greatly concerned. It is a situation that clearly demands wholehearted cooperation from Congress and from the executive agencies of the Government. The word should go out at once and with all earnestness, and should be understood to come from the genuine friends of these veterans. Let us do all we can, individually and together, to broadcast this appeal and frank statement of what they must expect if they encourage this congestion that is planned. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOODRUM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11362 and had come to no resolution thereon.

THE PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE OF MAY 5, 1932

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, on May 5 the President of the United States transmitted a message to Congress which aroused much discussion. Every Member of Congress, including Members of both parties, has received numerous communications, apparently based upon this message and generally expressing the feeling that Congress was refusing to enact economies, and, instead, was enacting much harmful legislation.

The President of the United States is always entitled to our high respect; but when he appeals to the country in an apparent effort to array the people against its Congress, he should be accurate, and it is necessary that the people themselves should understand the basis for his criticism.

In this message he refers to his constitutional privilege to advise the Congress upon the state of the Union. This, of course, he has. Instead, however, the message was an effort to shift in a large part the blame for the unhappy condition of the country, which has grown up under his administration, from his own shoulders to that of a Democratic House—a House barely Democratic by five majority when the entire membership can be present.

It was his distinct privilege to advise the Congress upon the state of the Union and to make specific recommendations. After 12 years of Republican administration and after an orgy of unprecedented spending, the state of the Union is undoubtedly bad. And when this Congress assembled in December, and the Democrats elected a Speaker by a bare majority, the country had already reached a state that can well be described as one of business despair. The Congress was facing a Republican deficit estimated at more than $2,000,000,000. The collection of income taxes, both individual and corporate, had fallen off under Mr. Hoover's administration more than $1,500,000,000 during the last fiscal year.

On the Democratic Party, with this slender minority in the House, and with a Republican Senate, was imposed the task of securing additional revenue to meet this enormous deficit, such revenue to be raised from a people which had been already reduced to the lowest earning power in the history of the Republic. From reading many statements in the press one can not escape the feeling that it is unjust to charge the Democratic Party, with a slender control of only one branch of the Government, with a failure in leadership because in a short period of three or four months it has not been able to set in order the disaster and unhappiness throughout the Nation. The facts involved, of course, are well known and will be properly appraised.

It is not my purpose now to discuss these facts in detail, but shortly to call attention to some of the specific things referred to in Mr. Hoover's message.

First he criticizes—the manner in which the House of Representatives rejected both the revenue program proposed by the Treasury and the program unanimously reported by the Committee on Ways and Means.

What the House defeated was the sales tax and, conceding that it is necessary to balance the Budget, the House levied taxes from other sources sufficient to effect such balance. Whether it was absolutely essential to lay additional taxes upon the people to meet this Republican deficit of $2,000,000,000 or more in its entirety at this time is open to discussion. I, of course, believe the duty of balancing the Budget exists, regardless of the blame for its creation. But, however this may be, the statement that the Treasury recommended a sales tax to the Committee on Ways and Means, as would be inferred from the President, can not be substantiated. Upon this point I shall content myself by quoting the statement of Mr. Mills, the Secretary of the Treasury, and one of Mr. Hoover's high Cabinet officials, made before the Ways and Means Committee in December, 1931, when the tax proposals were taken up for consideration. At that time Mr. Mills stated:

In the development of a program we considered many forms of taxation. We weighed, for instance, the merits of the general sales or turnover tax, but rejected it, not only because it bears no relation to ability to pay and is regressive in character but because of the enormous administrative difficulties and the almost inevitable pyramiding of the tax in the course of successive sales. * * * The tax is unquestionably passed on, and adds therefore to the cost of living.

Without entering into a discussion of the sales tax, I merely point this out for the purpose of showing to the people that it never had the support of the President, regardless of his statement, and regardless of the fact that it was his duty under the Constitution to make specific recommendations to the Congress.

He then refers in this message to the—action of the House, which would increase Government expenditures by $132,000,000 for road building.

Mr. Hoover is now urging a loan of $300,000,000 to the States for relief of the unemployed and agitating further expenditures to be made through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for public employment to relieve a situation which has grown continually worse under his handling for the last three years. Surely Congress can not be justly criticized with the situation that confronts it for undertaking to enact this emergency road act, which would by this time have given employment to thousands and would have effected needed improvements of vital importance.

This act to which he refers carried $132,000,000 and passed the House early in the session of this Congress. The North Carolina delegation, together with the chairman of the Highway Commission of North Carolina, met in conference and discussed the advisability of such legislation. The bill was introduced by Mr. WARREN, of North Carolina, a member of the Committee on Roads, and carries $120,000,000 to be allotted to the several States and to be repaid by the States out of the regular Federal-aid appropriations after 1938. It was estimated that 90 per cent of this expenditure would go to labor. It would give to North Carolina between $5,000,000 and $6,000,000 of money available to employ men at fair wages, to create a purchasing power, and at the same time to assist in completing the wonderful highway system of my State.

The remaining amount carried by this bill, $12,000,000, would be available in road construction in our national forest areas and our national parks. The bill now carries for national park purposes $3,000,000. When this bill was before the House I secured an amendment making the appropriation applicable to the Great Smoky Mountains National Park. If it had been enacted and signed by the President, it would have given us, and would now give us, approximately $300,000 for the construction of roads and trails in that great park, and would have resulted in making it more immediately accessible to the public, as well as giving employment to hundreds of men who are now so greatly in need of work.

In addition it would have provided additional funds for roads in our national forests, in which we have a large acreage in the western part of my State, approximating 400,000 acres. These great forests, too, belong to the people, and in addition to their other uses constitute potential areas for recreational purposes for the American people, and under mere executive order from the Secretary of Agriculture they have been and can be converted into vast usefulness for our people. The bill which he criticizes provides for additional funds for their development in the way of roads and trails.

The opposition of the President to measures of this kind, in view of his attitude on other matters and under present conditions, is not easily understood, and yet his message as a whole seems to have been acceptable by the press without any analysis whatever.

And it is more difficult to understand also because of the fact that under a Republican Congress at the last session a similar appropriation of $80,000,000 for emergency road work was enacted with his approval.

Notwithstanding the President's chiding and attempt to array the people against the Congress, I with other Members of the North Carolina delegation will diligently undertake to secure the enactment of this needed legislation. The enactment of this bill would bring immediate help, not only to all the States but to North Carolina it is of vast importance. There are many uncompleted highways, such as highway No. 28 and others, in my own section that rendered it of much importance to our people.

It seems to me that it would constitute one of those peculiarly useful appropriations by Congress to meet in some degree the very tide of unemployment which has flowed to the very door of the White House.

Apparently he has changed front on these matters. I quote from his message of December 3, 1929:

Federal aid in the construction of highway system in conjunction with the States has proved to be beneficial and stimulating. We must ultimately give consideration to the increase of our contributions to these systems, particularly with a view to stimulating of farm-to-market roads.

And, again in his message of December 4, 1930, in which he urged an additional appropriation of $150,000,000 for emergency construction, he outlines the value and the economic importance of plans of this character.

On March 14, 1932, he recommended $60,000,000 for additional river and harbor work. As late as April 27, 1932, the Director of the Budget pointed out that $623,000,000 had been expended for public works as a means of meeting the national emergency in unemployment.

It seems hard to escape the conclusion that he is no longer in accord with such appropriations when they are proposed by a Democratic House.

But, on the subject of economy legislation his message, so eagerly absorbed by the public, is still more remarkable.

He refers to the "virtual destruction of both the national economy program proposed by the executive officials and the program of the special House Committee on Economy." The country naturally obtained an idea from this that Congress had been utterly and absolutely neglectful of its undoubted duty to reduce our national expenditures. Nothing is more important. I believe it to be the duty of Congress, where the public service will not be destroyed, to resort to every possible reduction of expenditures. I do not believe that any government has the right to levy a single dollar in taxation upon the people above that which is necessary for absolute needs of government. These are matters in which I am glad to see the people are interested, and if the Democratic Party is given a mandate by the people, and given control, with adequate working majorities in the Congress, and of the Executive, the growing expenditures of this Government under Republican administration can be curtailed by above $1,000,000,000. Mr. Hoover has been a President of commissions. We can rid ourselves of them. The Wickersham Commission, as an illustration, cost us more than $500,000, with results that are negligible, and numerous others can be eliminated.

But let us examine the correctness of the intimation which the President evidently intended for the country to have. In the concluding portion of his message he says:

> I know that these actions do not reflect the will of the country, and I refuse to believe that the country is unable to reflect its will in legislation.

In other words, it is a direct appeal to the country, upon the idea that Congress was not regardful of the Nation's extremities to which Mr. Hoover and former Republican administrations have brought us.

He recommends that—

> A drastic program of economy which, including the savings already made in the Executive Budget of $369,000,000, can be increased to exceed $700,000,000 per annum. Considering that the whole Federal expenditure except about $1,700,000,000 is for uncontrollable obligations, this would represent an unprecedented reduction.

With what complacency he pats himself upon the back when he refers to the reductions recommended to Congress in the Budget and states that these reduce the Budget $369,000,000. I might state that the $369,000,000 largely represents items which would not again be expendable anyway. But that is not the point I wish to make. He then states that "a reduction" of at least $230,000,000 can be made in the supply bills. Does he tell the country what had already been done by this Democratic House in the supply bills? Not at all. He leaves the country to draw the inference that nothing has been done and that a Democratic House has been absolutely destructive of every proposition looking to economy. What are the facts? And why did not Mr. Hoover state all the facts to the Nation in his advisory message to Congress?

The facts are that the Democratic House, with its slender majority, and under the leadership of a Democrat as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, has made a total reduction in the supply bills which have already passed the House of $563,000,000 below Mr. Hoover's Budget of last year. In other words, at the time his statement was made to the people, the House had reduced by $171,000,000 Mr. Hoover's own Budget which he himself, under his own hand, had recommended to be expended by Congress during the next fiscal year.

In addition to the $171,000,000 there have also been made large savings, such as a 10 per cent reduction in the Interior appropriations bill, and other appropriations, amounting to many millions of dollars. In addition to that the economy bill, as passed by the House, carried a reduction of $42,000,000 to $50,000,000. It is estimated that at least $80,000,000 additional of reductions, under the Budget of last year, are in sight and will be effected before Congress shall adjourn. In view of the fact that the President himself insisted that reductions must be made from $1,700,000,000 of our expenditures, the remaining portion not being subject to reductions, it would seem to me that in the reductions already made Congress did recognize its duty in this respect and that it had been undertaking to perform this important task. With reductions already made and those to follow before Congress adjourns, the total reduction made under this leadership, which the President says has been so destructive, will amount undoubtedly to at least $600,000,000 to $700,000,000.

And, in defense of Congress, which I by no means claim to be free from blame in all respects, I might point to the fact that since the Budget system was established, under the Harding administration, and through his administration and the administrations of both Coolidge and Mr. Hoover, Congress each year continually appropriated less money for running the Government than had been recommended by these several Presidents in the Budget over their own signatures. In other words, the amounts actually appropriated by Congress have successively each year been less than those recommended by the Executive.

The House also, in the economy bill, conferred upon President Hoover the power and authority to effect consolidations of bureaus and other governmental agencies which should effect other reductions if he shall properly exercise his powers.

As a matter of fact I might call attention to the fact that, during all this period, the President as Chief Executive has had the power to rid the bureaus and departments of Government of all unnecessary personnel.

But, let us go to the economy bill again, about which he complains so bitterly. This bill was supposed to carry a reduction of $200,000,000 for the purpose of assisting in balancing the Budget. One of the items carried in this bill was the consolidation of the Army and Navy into one department, to be known as the Department of National Defense. This would, of course, have gotten rid of one of Mr. Hoover's prime Cabinet officers. The saving to be effected in this manner was estimated to be from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000. It can readily be seen that it composed a large part of the economy program in regard to which he says Congress has been so destructive. I voted for practically all of the provisions of the economy bill. I voted for this consolidation but it was defeated on the floor not by Democrats but by the overwhelming vote of the Republican membership. A reference to the vote taken in the House shows that this $50,000,000 to $100,000,000 reduction was defeated by a vote which was made up of 150 Republicans and 60 Democrats, while 139 Democrats and 48 Republicans voted for it. It was openly charged on the floor of the House that the private secretary of the President, who had formerly been a Member of Congress, openly lobbied against this consolidation while it was under discussion; and if there has been a "locust swarm of lobbyists" around Congress, it is certain that one of them, in this instance, came from the White House itself.

The purpose of these remarks is not to discuss in detail these items but to bring to the people, if I can, the real situation and to controvert the misleading inferences which the country would naturally have derived from this message of the President.

Some of the items of the economy bill should have been defeated. One of these I voted against. This was the provision to eliminate appropriations, after 1934, for our vocational educational schools, which have been so useful and constituted one instance of legislation which reaches down to the boy at home and attempts to lift him into a higher and more useful life.

But, again I repeat that I supported practically all of the provisions of the economy bill. I voted for a provision to reduce the congressional salaries by at least $1,000 annually, and to vigorously reduce compensation of many other high-salaried officers of the Government. This bill did effect substantial economy, and if the President himself had not interfered and but for Republican votes, which certainly the Democratic leadership should not be expected to control, a much larger degree of economy would have been brought about.

The President further in enumeration of charges against the Congress refers to—> the passage of legislation by the House placing a burden of impossible execution upon the Federal reserve system over the protest of the Federal Reserve Board.

In this he refers to the Goldsborough bill, which was enacted by the House, and with practically a unanimous Republican as well as Democratic vote. This bill directed the Federal reserve system to adopt a policy of expansion of the currency, under the provisions of the Federal reserve act, for the purpose and with the intent to restore property and commodity prices to the level of prices as they were from 1926 to 1928.

I do not recall any opposition of the President to this legislation when it was proposed. It may or may not accomplish the purposes for which it was intended. It was at least, however, a proposal and an effort to reestablish prosperity by creating a purchasing power for the dollar on a par with its purchasing power up to three years ago. In the opinion of many economists, if not all of them, this is a vital necessity.

Prof. Irving Fisher has discussed this fact. He is a recognized authority upon financial and economic questions. He thus states the problem:

> It is the fallacious and common opinion of the average man, until he is waked up by studying the subject enough to realize that the only real stability is stability of purchasing power, that what you really want is a commodity dollar, that what you really want is a market-basket dollar, a stability in purchasing power of our commodities in general, not of one commodity only, gold. In other words, what you want is a stable price level.

When Congress convened it was with the purpose of cooperating with the President. He made his specific recommendations. The first few months of this session were consumed in this way. Democrats of the House joined with the Republican Members, without partisanship, in adopting these. He told us the moratorium would help to restore confidence to business, national and international. We passed it. He told us that the passage of the reconstruction finance act was the one thing necessary. Again we passed it without party division. This act was for the purpose of creating a reservoir of credit, guaranteed by the United States Government itself, to the extent of $2,000,000,000, to be loaned to railroads, banks, insurance companies, and other enterprises in order to prevent a general bankruptcy throughout the country.

Of course, the President claimed these as administrative measures. I do not deny that it has had a beneficial effect, but it is all too evident that the frozen confidence to which he referred was not thawed out by its beneficent provisions. However necessary it may have been, it is evident that the mere creation of additional credit for enterprises already overburdened with debt has not restored prosperity as the President had predicted. It is impossible for us to borrow ourselves out of debt. There can come no distributed prosperity until the people as a whole are employed and until business can produce a profit and thus create a purchasing power which will set in motion again the wheels of industry. This is the problem that confronts not only the American Congress but the American people.

The Goldsborough bill was at least an attempt in this direction. When the President made his speech of acceptance in June, 1928, wheat was selling at $1.50 per bushel and cotton was selling for a little more than 20 cents per pound, and other commodities in like proportions. It was at this time that he predicted that poverty would be abolished.

Since that time wheat has dropped to less than 50 cents per bushel, and cotton has gone below 6 cents per pound. It can hardly be said that there are any market values left in the United States. Rental properties are no longer productive, and the man in debt can not convert his real estate or other holdings into cash for the purpose of relieving his distress.

As an illustration, a cotton farmer who mortgaged his farm in 1928, when cotton was selling at 20 cents a pound, and received for this mortgage money with such a purchasing power, had the right to expect to be able to discharge that mortgage with commodities upon a similar basis of value. The number of dollars written into the mortgage remains the same, but instead of getting $100 to $150 per bale for his cotton he has been receiving $30, and this would not pay the cost of production. The same may be said of the wheat farmer and all other agricultural products. Surely this situation demands a remedy.

Our civilization can not go forward and business can not thrive until some method is found to stabilize the purchasing power of the dollar, whatever may be the basis for currency. Either present commodity and property values must be increased in some way to values existing when this vast indebtedness of the Nation was created, or payment of the indebtedness can not be made whether it be individual or municipal. To meet this problem has been the despair of all economists, and certainly the old system to which the President holds and from which he censures Congress for departing, even to a degree, has not brought us anything but renewed business depression.

Again in this message he refers to veteran legislation:

> The action further to enlarge expenditures in non-service-connected benefits from the Veterans' Bureau at the very time when the House was refusing to remedy abuse in these same services.

In this statement he refers to a bill carrying pensions for widows of the deceased veterans. It was in line with legislation enacted through many years for this purpose. It was in line with legislation approved by the President at the last session of Congress, giving compensation to all veterans of the World War who found themselves diseased and disabled for work, whether their disease was due to service or not. This was enacted by a Republican Congress.

The press has referred to the widows' pension bill, which was voted for by practically every Republican Member of the House, as carrying an appropriation of $150,000,000. In another metropolitan paper, I have seen it stated that it was a bill to give pensions to the widows and all of the heirs of the soldier forever. Of course, this is not true. The bill provided for a small pension for widows of deceased veterans, and for a child under 16 years of age.

I have no doubt that abuses have crept into the administration of the pension laws of the country. In the economy bill itself it was provided by amendment to appoint a competent committee to examine into various matters relating to veterans' compensation and to make a report at the December session of Congress so that it might act intelligently upon these matters.

But, who shall say that the Government owes no duties to widows of veterans suddenly left by death with infant children to support? I do not believe the American people are unwilling to prevent suffering to dependents of those who offered themselves for the flag. Certainly not to any reasonable degree.

Let me state a case that this bill would have covered. A veteran received an injury to his leg, due to his service, and was receiving a small pension. This injury was, of course, service connected. He married and had three or four small children. In working as a woodsman a tree was cut and fell upon him. It is possible that his injury contributed to his inability to escape this falling tree. His widow applied for a pension, but was denied it under the law because the immediate cause of his death was not service connected. This bill would have continued this small pension to her.

Let us take another case. A veteran may have lost his good right arm, shot away in the trenches of France. He would receive a pension for this, but in case he should die from some disease or accidental injury his widow and children would be left without this small help from the Government.

And this is held up to the country as a piece of extravagant legislation by a Democratic House, when less than two years before the President had approved similar legislation by a Republican Congress.

He then refers to veterans as a "group," and sometimes they are referred to as a "minority."

I voted for the draft act, and under its stern provisions the strong hand of the Nation was laid upon the boys in every hamlet and from every fireside.

I believe that the expenses of the Veterans' Administration can be reduced in many cases and still leave adequate compensation for those who practically without pay constituted that "minority" in France and who manned our destroyers on the cold and wind-swept reaches of the North Sea. And whatever may be the merits and the necessity for economy in veterans' legislation I can not but feel that the country has a duty to discharge to these veterans. I do not believe they will demand, nor that Congress should vote, compensation which is not just, but I can recall only too vividly the time when these men were something more than just a "minority." They were an organized minority. They had to be organized. They had the job of saving our Western civilization as their objective. At the head of this minority was General Pershing, that great American chieftain, and it was they who at Chateau-Thierry turned back the gray troops of the Kaiser. Let us do them justice.

It's Tommy this, an' Tommy that,
An' "Tommy, wait outside";
But it's "Special train for Atkins"
When the trooper's on the tide.

But, Mr. Speaker, I realize, and Congress realizes, that the American people desire something more than caviling between the executive and legislative branches of the Government. Real economy and a balanced Budget should be the speedy objective of Congress.

Even if the entire economy bill had been passed, with a full $200,000,000 of reductions, I fear that it would have been but a bagatelle in bringing back prosperity to the people which for 12 years, under Republican administrations, has been gradually dwindling.

I am glad to see that the people are beginning to think in earnest upon our national problems. They have cause to do so. If they had given, and would now give, to the more vital subjects underlying this whole matter of our national prosperity, the same degree of analysis and examination that seems to have aroused them over the economy bill, I would feel that we were at last upon the road to recovery.

For 12 years we have been driving relentlessly to this disaster. Privilege, monopoly, greed have dominated the functions of our Government under Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover. I have often wondered why the people have sat with so much complacency while the functions of government have been diverted and used to establish unearned profits for those who have not sown until, like Samson of old, their very rapacity has pulled the house down upon us all.

The stock ticker has been too much the barometer of business to Mr. Hoover and the Republican Party. Even to-day the rise and fall of stocks upon Wall Street are the subject of anxiety for him and his party. Mr. Dawes recently, in a statement before the Ways and Means Committee said, in referring to Wall Street, that it was a mere "peanut stand" compared with the other business of the country. In this he was right. It is the man in the field, the man in the shop, the man in the store who alone can make general prosperity for this or any Nation. The workmen must be given wages and the business man, big and little, throughout the Nation must be given profits, and then, and not until then, will prosperity return.

Certainly there is something wrong somewhere. The Republicans have had continuous and uninterrupted control for more than a decade. Every branch of Government has been responsive to its will. Mr. Hoover has been one of the guiding hands throughout the whole period, either as President or as a Cabinet officer. Under the successive administrations of Republican Presidents since Mr. Harding agriculture has practically been destroyed. The farmer, in normal times, consumes 55 per cent of our manufactured articles. With the destruction of his purchasing power it is small wonder that the wheels of industry stopped. This lead directly to the cataclysm upon Wall Street, and under Republican management we have witnessed the destruction of values estimated in amount at the enormous figure of $100,000,000,000. And yet there are those who became so aroused over the economy bill, with its comparatively slight reductions, that they are ready to embrace the party which has brought us to the brink of such disaster.

Let me state a few salient facts. The population of this Nation represents about 6 per cent of the total population of the world. Included within our national boundaries is the greatest area of agricultural lands upon the earth, situated in the largest extent of the North Temperate Zone in the two hemispheres—the zone which is most conducive to human energy and activity.

This 6 per cent of the world's population owns and controls 50 to 60 per cent of all the basic products of commerce. We have 50 per cent of all the world's iron, steel, copper, and oil. We produce 55 per cent of the world's iron ore, 55 per cent of the world's pig iron, and 66 per cent of the world's steel. We have 62 per cent of the world's petroleum and 43 per cent of the world's entire supply of coal. We have 65 per cent of the world's naval stores, 52 per cent of the raw timber, 42 per cent of the phosphate, and 80 per cent of the world's sulphur. We produce 63 per cent of the world's mica, and 62 per cent of its lead, and 44 per cent of the world's zinc. We have 50 per cent of the world's railroads, 75 per cent of the world's telephone and telegraph lines, and 90 per cent of the world's automobiles.

This small percentage of the world's population thus controls the finest area of agricultural lands upon the earth and more than one-half of the world's natural resources, and yet we are eternally and forever afraid that some incompetent Asiatic will put us out of business.

The labor in the United States is the most efficient and the most productive of all the countries of the world. The average American laborer produces upon the basis of 30 to 1 as against the Asiatic cooley. Even as compared with England, the average production of the American laborer is upon a basis of 30 to 20. This means that the average American workman produces one-third more in his daily employment than the highly trained English laborer himself. This comparison holds good with all the countries of the world. If he has had better wages, he deserves them, because he produces more for his pay.

And yet to-day, with this vast reservoir of natural wealth, we have more than 8,000,000 of unemployed and people are starving in a land that has produced a surplus of everything.

Surely the people are willing at last to awaken from their disregard for these policies and examine into the fundamental causes. Among these they will find a Republican policy embodied in such indefensible legislation as the Smoot-Hawley bill and the use of governmental powers for exploiting the American people which have at last worked out their inevitable results.

Our exports have decreased in the last few years by billions of dollars. With an unsurmountable tariff wall around us international trade has become impossible. If the American farmer and producer had been able to sell abroad and bring even a portion of the vast amount which we have lost in international trade to augment their purchasing powers, the plowman would be singing in the field and the wheels of industry would not have stopped.

Through this great system of highly protective tariffs our own manufacturers have had to set up their plants in foreign countries to escape retaliatory measures against our commerce.

I see by the press to-day that there is a movement to establish a league between the Latin American countries for the purpose of reprisal against American trade, because of our excessive tariffs.

I have hurriedly referred to some of these vital problems which I should be glad to see the American people and the American press arouse themselves as they have recently done over the Budget and economy.

I believe the Budget must be balanced. I believe it will be balanced by this Congress. That it is a difficult question and requires time can not be denied. I might recall the fact that Mr. Hoover called in special session a Republican Congress to enact a tariff bill and it required 18 months to accomplish it.

I realize that the people are anxious and that time seems long as they are pinched by the depression which has settled upon our Nation. The House has enacted a bill which, in effect, does balance the Budget. I have outlined the economies in expenditures that it has already effected. But the fundamental ills to which I have referred can not be cured quickly; and through the Republican Party, not at all. It was through the Democratic Party, under Wilson, that vast and imperative reforms were established, and which brought prosperity to every class of our people. It is only through that party—opposed to privilege, opposed to monopoly, opposed to the levying of taxes except for absolute governmental expenses—that the real cure of our ills can come.

And now that the people are beginning to study matters pertaining to their National Government, I am hopeful that they will turn their minds to the analysis of the vital and important problems upon which the future prosperity of the Nation so thoroughly depends.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 381

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on House Resolution 381.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, on May 7 I introduced House Joint Resolution 381, proposing a new system of raising revenue to meet the present emergency. On every hand I am receiving pronounced approval of my plan. In order to explain precisely the reasons for the adoption of this new method, and to show how it will operate in practice, I have prepared some tabulations, which I respectfully ask all interested to examine and study.

THE BILL

The proposal as set out in House Joint Resolution 381 provides as follows:

[H. J. Res. 381, in the House of Representatives, Seventy-second Congress, first session]

Joint resolution to provide a special additional income tax of 1 cent on each dollar of gross income for the calendar year 1932, 1933, and 1934

Resolved, etc., That there shall be levied, collected, and paid by individuals and corporations, irrespective of, and in addition to, the income tax they are subject to under existing law, or any amendment thereof, a special tax of 1 cent on each dollar of gross income for the calendar years 1932, 1933, and 1934.

SEC. 2. This joint resolution shall take effect immediately.

In studying the income-tax returns, I found that although 498,110 corporations filed income-tax returns, only 214,412 paid any tax at all. The rest ducked! 283,698 corporations dodged paying taxes by every devious device known in the science of accounting: Exorbitant salaries to officers, padded pay rolls and expense accounts, pyramided costs for supplies, and so forth.

Of course, I do not mean to imply that all corporations are necessarily dishonest or that all resort to dishonorable tactics in avoiding their just liabilities to the Government. But it is undeniably true that all corporations, whose business warrants it, take advantage of the cleverness of "experts" to manipulate the complicated, distracting, and absurd provisions of the present income law to drive the best possible bargain with Uncle Sam.

For instance, it is noticeable that those corporations showing net incomes disclosed gross incomes aggregating nearly $80,000,000,000, while those corporations purporting to have no net income disclosed gross incomes aggregating $41,000,000,000!

How did this immense income disappear? Is there any doubt that it was through the legerdemain of bookkeeping? Altogether, those corporations that paid taxes and those which did not pay taxes actually took in total receipts of $121,000,000,000!

And how much did they pay taxes on? They paid taxes on $5,627,312,995, or just about 4 per cent on the gross income received.

Under my proposal they would pay 1 cent on every dollar they take in, and the United States Treasury would collect $1,202,917,116, in addition to the $618,246,431 collected in 1930 under the provisions of the existing income tax law.

In the case of individuals the situation is not quite so glaring but nevertheless is manifestly inequitable. In 1930, 3,376,000 persons made income-tax returns; but less than 2,000,000 actually paid any taxes whatever; 1,430,000 who made returns simply dodged.

The gross income so reported was $21,665,000,000, but taxes were only paid on $17,220,000,000.

In tabulations B and C, which I shall insert as part of my remarks, I have made an analysis of corporation and individual income-tax returns showing how and where the leaks in the present system occur and how they can be stopped by the application of my plan.

GROSS INCOME AS A BASIS

The advantage of using the gross income as a basis is that it is self-determining and not susceptible of being manipulated or concealed.

Under the present income-tax law it is in the deductions and exemptions and complicated brackets that the opportunities for tricky bookkeeping occur.

The gross income means, with respect to individuals, salaries received or receipts from the individual's trade, business, profession, or calling. With respect to corporations, it means gross receipts from whatever trade, industry, or business they are engaged in.

The basic idea of my plan is to put a 1 cent per dollar tax on the overhead, irrespective of the existing income tax law. Let them work out their manipulations in avoidance of taxation in their income-tax returns and take advantage of the exemptions and deductions allowed by the existing law, so long as we retain its stupidities, on the statute books.

But tell them, "On your gross income you will hereafter pay 1 cent per dollar tax on your receipts, in addition to the usual income tax."

THIS IS PRACTICALLY A SALES TAX

In effect, it is manifest that this proposal is tantamount to a sales tax of 1 cent on the dollar; but it does not burden the consumer as it is imposed at the source and exempts no one whatever.

The sales tax presented to the House by the Ways and Means Committee was bad enough when it first appeared, but when the membership of the House got through with it, in making discriminatory exemptions in favor of this or that industry or calling it was neither fish, flesh, nor herring.

HOW IT WORKS

In tabulation A, which I will insert in a moment, it will be noticed how equitably and fairly the "cent a dollar special tax" works out.

I compare it with the raise in the income tax rates as proposed in the Senate. I make bold to state that the proposed Senate rates will give no comparable increase in revenue, while unduly taxing those in the lower brackets.

Looking at this Table A, it will be noticed that a single person, with a net income of $5,000 per annum, will pay under the proposed Senate rates a tax of $101.25. Under my plan, $89.38.

With a ten thousand a year income, the individual under the Senate-plan proposal will pay $433.75; under my plan, $291.88; and so on down the list.

TABLE A.—How the tax of 1 cent per dollar of gross income will affect single persons

Gross income	Net income less exemptions	Tax under existing law	1 cent per dollar tax suggested	Total tax	Tax under proposed Senate bill
$3,000	$1,500	$16.88	$30.00	$46.88	$48.75
$4,000	2,500	28.13	40.00	68.13	75.00
$5,000	3,500	39.38	50.00	89.38	101.25
$8,000	6,500	121.88	80.00	201.88	282.50
$10,000	8,500	191.88	100.00	291.88	433.75
$20,000	18,500	911.88	200.00	1,111.88	1,653.75
$30,000	28,500	2,071.88	300.00	2,371.88	3,353.75
$50,000	48,500	5,171.88	500.00	5,671.88	8,243.75
$100,000	98,500	16,351.88	1,000.00	17,351.88	28,653.75
$500,000	498,500	116,351.88	5,000.00	121,351.88	230,653.75
$1,000,000	998,500	241,351.88	10,000.00	251,351.88	493,153.75

ADVANTAGE OF CENT PER DOLLAR PLAN

But the chief advantage of the cent per dollar plan is that, in addition to avoiding an unnecessary increase in the present income-tax rates, it will bring a revenue into the Treasury of $2,000,000,000 without being felt.

THE TABULATIONS

In tabulation B, "Individual incomes—Effect of 1 cent per dollar special tax on individual gross incomes," which I here insert, it will be noticed that individual income-tax receipts will be enhanced over $222,000,000.

TABLE B.—Individual incomes—Effect of 1 cent per dollar special tax on individual gross income

In tabulation C, which is here inserted, it appears that in 1930 the gross incomes were $120,291,711,697. Under the "cent a dollar" plan they would pay a revenue of $1,202,917,116.

TABLE C.—Corporation incomes—Effect of 1 cent per dollar special tax on corporation gross incomes

	Number of returns showing net income	Number of returns showing no net income	Number of corporations inactive	Total gross incomes	Taxes paid	Taxes which must be paid under the 1 cent per dollar plan	Total to be realized
Number of returns (498,110)	214,412	231,287	52,411
Total amount	Gross income $79,147,023,818	Gross income $41,144,687,879		$120,291,711,697	$618,246,431	$1,202,917,116	$1,821,163,547

Then, in tabulation D we have a summary, which shows that the total receipts from the present income tax, fortified by the "cent a dollar" tax, based on 1930 returns, would amount to $2,516,025,118, instead of, as was actually collected, only $1,091,935,994.

TABLE D.—Summary—showing revenue under 1 cent per dollar tax plan

From individuals	$694,861,571
From corporations	1,821,163,547
Total gain	2,516,025,118

I submit just two instances to show how the plan would work in actual operation:

CORPORATIONS

A corporation selling $1,000,000 worth of goods would pay a $10,000 tax. If the article they manufactured and sold was, for instance, frying pans, and they manufactured and sold 4,000,000 of them at 25 cents each, the tax on each frying pan would figure to be about one-fourth of 1 cent—too small to be shifted, pyramided, or otherwise burdensome to the consumer.

INDIVIDUALS

With respect to individuals the Internal Revenue Bureau reveals that under the present law few, if any, married men drawing less than $4,000 a year pay any income tax whatever. First, they are allowed $3,500 exemption, and then $400 for each child. Under my bill a married man drawing $4,000 would pay $40 and would have the satisfaction of knowing that he was contributing something for the relief of his country in its present emergency. This, it seems to me, is a good deal better than standing a cut of several hundred dollars in his salary as the present indications point out is likely to happen.

In conclusion, I desire to repeat here what I said in my speech on this subject (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, May 7, 1922, p. 9796).

THE PROPOSED LAW WILL BE SELF-REGULATORY AND INESCAPABLE

The tax is self-regulatory. It is figured on the income-tax returns and paid at the same time and in the same manner as the income tax. It can not be evaded. There will hereafter be "no taxless income-tax returns." All will pay on the basis of business done, whether they show a net profit or not.

A 1-cent per dollar addition to the income tax will spread the burden and the steadiness of revenue obtained will enable Congress to eventually get away from the intricate bracket schemes in the present law—a thing that every honest business man is anxious to accomplish.

By arranging their budgets, corporations and individuals will be able to figure on this special tax as a part of their overhead. It is not an arbitrary tax, but one depending on the business done or salary received.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the Philippine question.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Speaker, Right Rev. Edwin F. Lee is the Methodist Bishop of Manila and Singapore. He is well informed in reference to conditions in the Philippines. In his report to his church board he declares the Philippine Islands are ready for and capable of self-government.

The question is of such importance—

Bishop Lee said—that the American Government should consider it by itself alone and not link it up with any tariff question.

The Philippine people have proved apt pupils under a worthy instructor, and no group in the Orient has shown the development in the last 30 years as the Filipinos.

Despite some mistakes made by the American Government, the result is considered in the Far East as one of the most outstanding experiments in colonial government ever made. Their people deserve, and have won, just consideration for an independence that would be mutually advantageous to both countries.

Reverend Lee pointed out that of 12,000,000 people, there are now 1,200,000 in government schools, learning English and that more than 98 per cent of government officials are Filipinos. This is not news to those who have made a study of the Philippine problem.

As a people, we Americans must not be too proud and complacent. It is folly to assume that we have a monopoly on capacity for self-government. By using this talent, we may have acquired from long experience more efficiency in self-government than other nations, yet our record is not 100 per cent perfect, and in some respects we have failed to outstrip other nations. Moreover, other nations and races are quite capable of acquiring efficiency in the science of self-government. There is no race, however backward, that does not hold tremendous possibilities for the future.

The diminutive, brown-skinned Filipino has skillful hands, a generous heart, an industrious disposition, a forward-looking ambition, and in his already quickened mind lie latent talents which when stimulated are capable of superb accomplishments. He is destined to be a potential factor and influence for good in the development of the long-slumbering but now awakening Orient.

In the language of Phillips Brooks:

There is no life so humble that, if it be true and genuinely human and obedient to God, it may not hope to shed some of its light. There is no life so meager that the greatest and wisest of us can afford to despise it. We can not know at what moment it may flash forth with the life of God.

Nor can we afford to disdain or contemptuously treat the Filipino race or recklessly challenge their governmental capacities. They are now in a state of rapid and remarkable development. We can not assume their progress will be arrested or that they will deteriorate. On the contrary, their accomplishments in the past justify our confidence in their ability to overcome their handicaps and take their place in the family of self-governing States.

We boast that our Nation, great in resources, power, and accomplishments, is as yet unsullied by an abandonment of the principles that gave it life and virility, namely, personal, political, religious, and economic freedom, and equality of opportunity in all the walks of life. Shall we confess to the world that self-government is a good thing for an American but an unmitigated evil for a Filipino? Shall we tarnish the luster of our country by denying to 13,000,000 Filipinos the kind of government we enjoy and cherish? The thirteen American Colonies were not willing to remain dependencies of the far-flung British Empire. They scorned proposals that would have given them exclusive control of their domestic affairs, though falling short of complete political freedom or unlimited self-government.

Shall we expect the Filipinos to be more servile than our forefathers were in 1776? The 3,000,000 American colonists were unwilling to be governed by a kindred race, 3,000 miles away, and should we expect 13,000,000 Filipinos to complacently submit to the yoke of an alien race 8,000 miles away and on the opposite side of the globe? There is no middle ground between ultimate and complete independence and ultimate and complete subjection of the Filipinos. We will sooner or later stand face to face with one of these alternatives.

By our indifference to the appeals of the Filipinos for independence we are breaking the sacred maxims which are supposed to actuate a free people and doing violence to the principles on which our Republic is founded. Those who insist on our holding the Philippines are blundering pilots, who in order to retain a little trade and commerce will inevitably bring discredit on our Nation and involve us in an age-lasting feud with the Filipinos. Holding 13,000,000 people in subjection is a far-reaching undertaking, and its proposal should provoke the wrath and indignation of every liberty-loving and red-blooded American.

No government of the Philippines can endure that does not rivet itself to the hearts of the native inhabitants, and such a government we can never hope to give them, because if we deny them independence they will look on us as interlopers and adhere more tenaciously to their right to govern themselves, which is a natural right and is the inalienable privilege of every self-respecting, forward-looking race. By attempting to hold the Philippines permanently, or for a long and indefinite period, we are inviting sedition and straining the ties of friendship between our people and the Filipinos dangerously close to the breaking point.

Looking far into the future and weighing the advantages and disadvantages, it would be unwise—yes, foolish—for us to hold the Philippines or unreasonably delay their manumission. Of course, we have the resources and power to maintain our flag in the Philippines, and grant the inhabitants only such participation in government affairs as is consonant with our arrogant and imperious will. But what could we hope to gain by such a course? Nothing but vanity and vexation of spirit; only gall and wormwood, bitterness, deep-seated resentment, and unabating animosity; a little gold lace, glitter and tinsel on our livery, but heavy heartaches, ever-increasing disappointments, unabating self-condemnation, a harvest of vain regrets, and serious national embarrassments.

It is cowardly for us to pass the solution of this perplexing problem on to our posterity. This issue will not solve itself. Without prompt treatment the situation will become more complicated, and the more difficult it will be to find a satisfactory solution. If we exercise our great power and influence to drive a sharp bargain and deprive the Filipino of his birthright of freedom, we will never cease to regret it. Our good name and reputation for fair dealing and square shooting is involved in this transaction.

We should compose our controversy with the Filipinos in a manner that will involve no sacrifice of our national honor, no violation of the principles and ideals on which our Government is founded, no infringements on the rights of the Filipinos, no abandonment of their self-respect and God-given rights, and no diminution of the confidence, good will, and affection that now exists and should always continue between the people of the United States and the Filipino race.

I am persuaded the Filipinos are destined to play an important part in the future of the Orient. Their development as a self-governing state will not impair but augment our influence in the Far East. With the tremendous lead we have in the industrial, commercial, and financial world, there is no reason why the United States can not control a lion's share of the commerce of the Pacific and Orient, which in value and tonnage will ultimately surpass that of any other subdivision of the globe.

I am convinced that the Filipinos, under self-government, will find their prosperity and interests promoted by maintaining intimate and reciprocal commercial relations with the United States, and that each Republic, by mutual cooperation in the interchange of commerce, will materially aid and enrich the other; and this will be worth infinitely more than any benefits that could accrue to us by holding these islands and engendering the everlasting ill will and hatred of the inhabitants. It is not only our duty to free the Philippines but our national interests will be tremendously promoted by such action. As a straight line is the shortest distance between two points, so right and justice should characterize our dealings with our insular wards.

And so I say, in our efforts to settle the Philippine problem, we must not weigh the rights of the Filipinos on an apothecaries' scales. From them no moiety of their rights should be withheld. Their privileges should not be infringed or their prerogatives usurped. Ours should be a steadfast resolution and an inflexible purpose to grant the Filipinos a full measure of justice; for in all the earth, nothing excelleth justice. According to Sidney Smith:

Truth is its handmaid, freedom is its child; peace is its companion; safety walks in its steps, victory follows in its train; it is the brightest emanation from the gospel; it is the attribute of God.

No, friends, we can not afford to abate one jot or title of our obligations to grant independence to the inhabitants of the Philippines.

No inaction by Congress, no program of delay, no policy of equivocation, no limited autonomy, no administrative lotions, no concessions short of absolute independence, no bolts, bars, padlocks, strait-jackets, no selfish and sordid appeals to the commercial and financial instincts and interests of the Philippines, no "let well enough alone" argument, none of these can arrest or hamper the arrow-swift movement of the Filipino race for unconditional manumission. Their aspirations for freedom, suppressed by three centuries of Spanish usurpation, is now unleashed and moving like an ever-swelling and irresistible tide that will not abate one iota until Filipino independence is an accomplished fact.

He who ruleth the raging sea and controls the planets in their revolutions around the sun will bring to naught every selfish purpose and sinister plan to withhold from the Filipinos the God-given privilege of self-government.

EVENING SESSION

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House stand in recess until 8 o'clock to-night, when general debate upon the state of the Union may be indulged in by Members. I ask this because of the fact that it has been so difficult lately for any Member to secure time in which to discuss any particular subject at any length.

Mr. HULL. I desire to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] is necessarily detained from the Senate by illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. GLASS. I desire to announce that my colleague the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is still detained from the Senate in attendance upon the disarmament conference at Geneva. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce the necessary absence from the city of the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] on legislative business. He has a general pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN]. I wish this announcement to stand for the day and to be applied on all votes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

CONSIDERATION OF AGRICULTURAL RELIEF BILLS

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I send to the desk a unanimous-consent proposal.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unanimous-consent proposal will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from North Dakota proposes the following unanimous-consent agreement: That there shall be no agreement to adjourn and that no adjournment of this session of Congress shall be taken until there has been a vote of the Senate recorded upon the question of the passage of Senate bill 4536, introduced by Mr. MCNARY, and on Senate bill 1197, introduced by Mr. FRAZIER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, what is the bill introduced by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER]?

Mr. NYE. Both these bills have been reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to the Senate and are now on the Senate Calendar.

Mr. WATSON. But I am asking for information. What is the bill introduced by the Senator's colleague?

Mr. NYE. It is the bill known as the agricultural refinancing bill.

Mr. WATSON. Does it have reference to the debenture or equalization fee, or both?

Mr. NYE. It does not.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think the proposal had better lie over a day.

Mr. NYE. Yesterday I consented to let it go over pending what I understood would be an agreement. I hope the Senator will not object at this time.

Mr. WATSON. I have not the slightest objection to there being a vote on these measures, but I do object to it coming in immediately after the passage of the tax bill.

Mr. NYE. This unanimous-consent proposal does not ask for that.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not think any Senator in the present condition of affairs has any right to ask such an agreement of the Senate. The calendar is clogged with business in which various Senators are interested. I do not see why any particular bill should be picked out for preference, and therefore I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I had hoped this consent agreement might be entered into to the end that there would be more expeditious passage of the tax bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. NYE. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I suggest that the request for unanimous consent that the Senate shall remain in session until it passes a particular bill is hardly fair.

Mr. NYE. That was not the request. The request was that the Senate remain in session until there had been a vote upon the measures.

Mr. President, I had hoped to expedite the passage of the tax bill by avoiding the apparent necessity of proposing to attach these bills as amendments to the pending tax bill. I am going to urge upon the Senator from Pennsylvania, in view of the nature of the unanimous-consent proposal, that he withdraw his objection.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. NYE. I am glad to yield.

Mr. BRATTON. If the Senator from Pennsylvania should withdraw his objection I would feel impelled to object under the circumstances. I do not think the Senate should be asked to single out any particular bill and pledge itself to remain in session until a vote is had upon it. We have a number of urgent measures, perhaps some more urgent than others and perhaps some less than others, but I can not give my consent to singling out any particular measure and binding ourselves not to adjourn until we vote upon it. So, if the Senator from Pennsylvania should withdraw his objection, I then would feel obliged to interpose one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. KING. Regular order!

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOWELL obtained the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I present to H. R. 10236 an amendment known as the emergency manufacturers' excise tax amendment. I ask that the amendment may be printed, and I shall at a later stage in the proceedings offer it and call it to the attention of the Senate for their action thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I also ask that a report in the nature of personal views, prepared by me, explaining in detail the provisions of the amendment which I propose to offer later, may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator desire it printed as a part of his present remarks?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Yes; and also I ask that it may be printed as a separate report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, that order is made.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I expect during the day that both the amendment and the report explaining its features will be on the desks of Senators.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I ask the Senator if the amendment embodies the so-called general sales-tax provision?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It does.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I also ask when the Senator expects it to be reached?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. After the committee amendments shall have been disposed of.

The personal views of Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts, above referred to, were ordered to be printed as part 3 of Report No. 665, and also to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Senate Report 665, part 3, Seventy-second Congress, first session]

REVENUE BILL OF 1932

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Finance, submitted the following personal views (to accompany H. R. 10236):

Explanatory of amendment to H. R. 10236, providing for an emergency manufacturers' excise tax

I present my views explaining the amendment known as the emergency manufacturers' excise tax, which I shall move for adoption by the Senate, and submit a brief explanation of each section of the amendment.

SEC. 602. GENERAL MANUFACTURERS' EXCISE TAX—IMPOSITION

The rate is fixed at 1¾ per cent. The yield on this rate is expected to be about $335,000,000.

The machinery set up for the imposition of this tax is what is known as the license system in distinction from the two other systems, known as the turn-over tax and the tax on value added by the manufacturer, which would be determined by deducting from the wholesale price the cost of purchases of materials. After careful consideration of these three different methods, the Ways and Means Committee of the House unanimously reached the conclusion that the licensing system was the best of the three. It is substantially the same as the Canadian system.

The turn-over tax system, which is popularly called a general sales tax, is objectionable on the ground of pyramiding the price of commodities because of the collection of taxes at different stages in the process of manufacture. It is possible, however, that the yield would be so much more in a general sales tax, thereby the rate being made much less, that the net result would not be more burdensome.

The licensing system, briefly stated, is as follows: Every manufacturer or producer doing a gross business of over $20,000 a year is required to take out a license through the Treasury Department. The tax is imposed on all sales by these licensed manufacturers, except in the case of specifically exempted articles, and except in the case of articles sold to other licensed manufacturers for further manufacture. This eliminates the imposition of successive taxes at different stages of manufacture, so that the net result is one tax on the sale of the finished article by the last manufacturer.

The licensing system also provides for the registration of certain dealers who sell partly manufactured articles to licensed manufacturers for further manufacture.

The licensing of manufacturers is limited to those doing business of over $20,000 a year for administrative reasons, to eliminate a large number of small taxpayers the yield from whom would not justify the cost of collection. In the Canadian law option is given to the administrators of the law to eliminate small manufacturers from the tax. This amount of $20,000 was fixed by the Ways and Means Committee as the best division that could be made as between small producers and manufacturers who do a very limited business and those who manufacture on a more extensive scale. The exemption of these small manufacturers does not mean a total loss of the tax, because the sale of materials to them is taxed, while the licensed manufacturers do not have to pay a tax upon the sales of goods to them because they pay the tax upon those goods in the value of the finished product.

In order that this tax shall not operate as a disadvantage to domestic manufacturers as compared with importers, a corresponding tax of 1¾ per cent is imposed on the duty-paid value of all imported articles.

The only articles not reached by this tax are those which are sold to or imported for a State or political subdivision thereof, for use solely in the exercise of governmental functions. Under the Constitution we could not tax sales to the States. It would be possible to exempt sales to the United States Government, but this amendment does not provide for such a case.

(1) Food for human or animal consumption (including tea and coffee). This is substantially the same as was finally incorporated in the House bill. However, the committee's original recommendation only included certain specified classes of food.

(2) Medicines: Patent or proprietary medicines are to be taxed. The exempt medicines would be the standard medicines, such as those listed in the United States Pharmacopœia, and medicines generally prescribed by physicians or used in compounding prescriptions. This would mean that medicines like "Peruna," "Tanlac," "Father John's Medicine," and numerous others assumed to be manufactured at a profit, would be taxed under "patent or proprietary medicines."

(3) Wearing apparel: The House made no exceptions as to the cost of wearing apparel. This amendment provides that manufacturers of shoes selling for more than $5 a pair at wholesale shall be subject to the tax, and other articles of wearing apparel sold at a price in excess of $35 each at wholesale shall be subject to a manufacturers' excise tax. This limitation of $35 is fixed for the purpose of permitting coats and overcoats at moderate prices to be given the benefit of the exemptions. It is our belief that fixing the limitation at $35 would exempt suits, overcoats, and cloaks selling at retail under $50.

(4) Agricultural products: This would include everything produced on the farm.

(5) Agricultural implements and machinery and parts thereof, including gas and electricity employed in farm use or for irrigation or other farm purposes.

(6) Workmen's hand tools.

(7) Fertilizers.

(8) Articles already taxed under the internal revenue laws: This would exempt tobacco, which already pays a large internal-revenue tax, and other articles which pay a revenue tax, such as playing cards, pistols, and oleomargarine.

(9) Newspapers, magazines, and other periodicals: The publishers of these periodicals will not have to pay a tax but a tax will be imposed upon the manufacturers of the materials used, such as paper, ink, machinery. That probably means about as much revenue as if the tax was put upon the publishers themselves. Another reason for this inclusion is based upon the theory that these newspapers, magazines, and periodicals are either of educational, charitable, or religious service.

SEC. 603. TAX ON SALES BY REGISTERED DEALERS

This is an administrative feature. It provides that if a dealer sells other than to a licensed manufacturer any article he has purchased free of tax for resale to a licensed manufacturer he pays the tax.

SEC. 604. SALE PRICE

This gives rules for determining sales price in specific cases.

(a) The general rule. It provides for the inclusion of all charges incident to placing the article in condition for shipment and for the exclusion of transportation, delivery, and similar charges.

(b) In the case of a sale on consignment the price shall be a fair manufacturer's price for the article.

(c) Where the manufacturer or producer, as happens in some cases, sells at retail, the tax shall be imposed on the price at which sold, except that in the case of any such article ordinarily sold at wholesale (or directly to the consumer or user at prices varying with the quantity or character of use) by manufacturers or producers the tax shall be imposed upon the fair manufacturer's price for the article.

The parentheses is for the purpose of providing that the tax on the price of electricity shall be on the wholesale price rather than actual selling price.

(d) Installment sales: Taxes imposed on each installment when paid.

(e) Leases and royalties: The tax is imposed on each payment under the lease or royalty contract when the payment is made. The royalty contracts, of course, are only those involving articles taxable under this amendment.

(f) Manufacture under contract: This paragraph prevents avoidance of the tax in cases where one person contracts with another for the manufacture of an article.

(g) Use or transfer of article in special cases:

This covers cases where—

(1) A person manufactures articles for his own use.

(2) Where a person transfers a title by gift.

This would cover free samples, and so forth.

(3) Transfers an article at less than fair market price.

This would apply particularly to transfers between affiliate companies where it is possible to establish fictitious prices.

(h) Defines the fair manufacturers' price.

SEC. 605. OVERPAYMENTS, CREDITS, AND REFUNDS

This provides for credits and refunds of the tax in cases where a manufacturer has bought tax-paid materials and used them in the manufacture of articles on which he pays a tax, in cases where tax-paid articles are exported, and in cases where the sale price on which the tax is based is readjusted because of the return of the article or container, or by a discount, rebate, or allowance.

Provision is made that the manufacturer can not get credit or refund of any tax which he has passed on to the purchaser, unless he repays the amount of the tax to the person to whom it was passed on or obtains the consent of that person.

SEC. 606. LICENSED MANUFACTURERS AND REGISTERED DEALERS

This section simply provides machinery for issuing licenses.

SEC. 607. RETURNS, RECORDS, AND PAYMENT AND COLLECTION OF TAX

This is administrative.

SEC. 608. EVASION OF TAX

This contains administrative provisions to prevent evasion of tax.

SEC. 609. TAX ON MANUFACTURER OR PRODUCER NOT LICENSED

Provides that if somebody who was not licensed, and therefore does not pay any tax on his sales, represents that his price includes a tax, he is made liable for the amount of that tax.

SEC. 610. CONTRACTS FOR SALE ENTERED INTO BEFORE MARCH 1, 1932—REGULATED RATES

The imposition of an excise tax on the manufacturer or producer of an article becomes at once one element in his cost of production and is reflected in the price which he must obtain or will obtain for the article. In order, therefore, that all manufacturers and producers may be put upon the same footing and upon an equality in competitive situations, and to avoid injustice and discrimination, it is provided that in the case of contracts made prior to March 1, 1932, and in the case of articles where the sales price is fixed by governmental regulation, the purchaser shall be liable for the tax, which will ordinarily be collected from him and paid over to the Government by the seller.

The March 1, 1932, date is an arbitrary one and is the same date as was provided for in the House bill. In fixing this date it was thought that since that time the public has had notice of the possibility of some form of manufacturers' excise tax being levied and that contracts entered into since that date have provided for that contingency and have provided for the purchaser assuming the tax or for the price of the article to be increased by the amount of the tax if such a tax were levied, but that in the case of contracts prior to March 1 the manufacturer or producer could not have been expected to anticipate such a tax and therefore is fairly entitled to the protection which is afforded to him by the provisions of section 610.

In the case of regulated rates we are called upon to deal with the situation which is presented when we propose to impose an excise tax upon an article the sales price of which is fixed by governmental regulation. With respect to gas and electricity, the rates have been fixed without any reference to the excise tax now proposed to be imposed. Rate revisions are long and complicated processes, and so just as we permit other manufacturers and producers who have entered into contracts without contemplation of or provision for this excise tax, so in the case of the producers of gas and electricity we provide that the vendee rather than the vendor shall be liable for the tax. Not to do so would be to discriminate against a single industry, and as to it to impose a tax which could not be passed on, while as to every other industry the tax was passed on.

SEC. 611. FINAL AGREEMENTS

A number of difficult questions with respect to the tax under this title, such as the determination of the fair manufacturers' price, will arise between the department and the taxpayers. This section should reduce litigation, since it provides that the Government and the taxpayer may make a final agreement governing such doubtful points for the past or future, which agreement is absolutely binding on both parties. The experts of the Treasury who have been consulted in drafting this bill considered this an important provision and that it will facilitate administration of this law.

It is very important in levying a tax of this kind that the manufacturer shall know what his liability will be, and by having an agreement entered into with the Government he will know definitely and can rely upon the assurance of the Government as to what his liability will be.

SEC. 612. EFFECT OF CHANGES IN ADMINISTRATIVE DECISIONS

This provides that the revocation or amendment of any regulation or ruling of the department shall not have the retroactive effect of increasing any person's liability with respect to sales made before such revocation or amendment.

SEC. 613. APPLICABILITY OF ADMINISTRATIVE PROVISIONS

This simply provides for the application to this tax of provisions of existing law.

SEC. 614. PENALTIES

The penalty for violation is fixed at one-half the amount of tax evaded; or if that can not be determined, not more than $1,000; or six months' imprisonment, or both.

SEC. 615. EXCLUSION OF TAX FROM GROSS INCOME

This section is put in to prevent any person other than the one who paid the tax to the United States claiming it as a deduction from gross income on the ground that, since it was passed on to him, he can deduct it as a tax paid by him. This is a precautionary measure.

SEC. 616. REGULATIONS

This provides for all necessary rules and regulations to administer the provisions of this law.

SEC. 617

NOTE.—The definition of "article" includes gases and electricity. These definitions are substantially the same as the House provision.

SEC. 618. PERSONNEL

This was a Treasury recommendation that the Ways and Means Committee accepted.

SEC. 619. EFFECTIVE DATE—DATE OF EXPIRATION

This fixes the date when the provisions of the act shall take effect as the thirtieth day after enactment of the act, except the provisions for final agreements and for regulation are to take effect immediately. The last sentence provides for the termination of this tax on June 30, 1934.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment which I expect to propose to the tax on checks limiting checks to be taxed to $100 and over. I ask that the proposed amendment may be printed and lie on the table. It can be clearly demonstrated that the revenue to be derived from this tax will come from small checks and not from the larger ones. So I present the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table to be called up by its author at the appropriate time.

The amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. HAWES is as follows:

On page 286, line 1, after the first comma, insert "for $100 or over."

PAYMENT OF FOREIGN DEBTS

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, under the caption "Stimson Discusses Policy with Hoover—Gives to President Detailed Picture of Foreign Problems," there appeared an article written by Mr. Harold J. T. Horan in the Washington Post on May 23, reading in part, as follows:

Secretary Stimson outlined the interdependence of all the problems that now beset Europe—disarmament, war debts, tariffs, reparations, and economic depression. * * * Although no attempt was made to draw Secretary Stimson into a discussion on war debts while he was in Europe, the imminence of the problem still made itself felt on every side. The position of this Government, as outlined by the Secretary himself some time before leaving for Geneva, was against any further action on the subject of war debts until Europe had first set her own house in order.

From this it may be properly assumed that this was Secretary Stimson's attitude in his contacts while abroad, and must necessarily have stimulated the hopes of our debtors that the United States Government might consider further concessions in connection with their debts. Certainly developments indicate that Downing Street is not in the least discouraged.

In a cable from London to the Washington Star under date of May 24, Mr. Negley Farson stated, in referring to a recent editorial in the London Times, that—

The editorial bluntly puts on record the growing realization here that the Americans mean business when they say that there must be real disarmament and a real European agreement regarding reparations before the American taxpayer will be willing to burden himself further by voluntarily canceling a portion of the European debts.

Thus it is evident that our European debtors have been inspired with the belief that if Europe does set its house in order, then the American taxpayer might be willing to add to the tremendous burden he has already assumed because of these debts.

In short, Europe is intently pursuing its long-ago determined course to in some manner or in some way inveigle American taxpayers to relieve Europe from the war debts due the United States. This is emphasized by another quotation from Mr. Farson's cable. In discussing resumption of payments this coming year, he says:

Great Britain's resumption of its war-debts payments to the United States, whether Germany and the Allies defaulted or not, would not in the least mean abandonment of pressing for complete cancellation, which the British have been advocating ever since 1922. It merely means facing the fact that the Americans will not agree—yet.

In a recent cable to the New York Times from its London correspondent, Mr. Selden, he reports that Britain—does not expect to pay next year's American war-debt annuity of $183,900,000, and, furthermore, does not believe the United States will drive her into default if she does not pay. Chancellor of the Exchequer Chamberlain has privately told members of the House of Commons that he had not only made no provision in the regular budget to pay the American debt, but was not devising any supplementary budget to provide for such payment. This does not mean that Britain has the slightest intention of defaulting. It will not be a default or repudiation if she can not pay the full amount when it falls due, but gets either an extension of time or a reduction of the amount, or both. It is in expectation of some such development that Britain is now awaiting the results of the American election.

Mr. President, this implies that the British think they have reason to believe that the cancellation of European debts will be in fact an issue in the coming campaign; if not a vocal issue, an issue nevertheless—a mute issue—and therefore that further modifications of payments by our debtors, or complete cancellation, will be assured unless objections to further debt remissions are seriously voiced between now and next November.

In Mr. Arthur Brisbane's daily editorial, appearing yesterday morning, he stated that—

It is reported seriously that England, France, and Italy have united to "bar the payments of debts to us." They are said to have arranged what might be called a "welching bloc," as though three bookmakers should agree not to pay what they owe, hoping to make the welching less unpleasant by making it cooperative.

Again, this morning, the United Press carries a report from London that Maj. Walter Elliott, financial secretary to the treasury, told the House of Commons yesterday that no arrangements—had been made to pay war-debt annuities to the United States after the expiration of the Hoover debt holiday.

Mr. President, tremendous forces are vigorously at work not only in Europe but in this country, as they have been ever since and immediately following the armistice, to prevail upon Congress to sacrifice the huge debts due the United States from our former associates in the Great War.

Therefore, in connection with this tax bill and the huge taxes proposed—which are, in a large measure, due to the nonpayment of these debts—I deem it appropriate again to present shortly certain facts relating to Europe's indebtedness to us and to call attention to the enormous sacrifices we have already made.

The echo of the last gun fired in the Great War had scarcely died away when there was initiated in Europe a project for the cancellation of the war debts due the United States.

It penetrated the chancelleries of that continent, it stalked to the peace table, it reached across the Atlantic and clasped hands with our international bankers, it intrigued our trade associations and chambers of commerce, it instituted an all-enveloping propaganda that worked while many of us slept. Following a prolonged barrage the British Debt Commission finally arrived in Washington and the cancellation project largely triumphed.

The British settlement provides for cancellation, except that for 62 years Britain is merely to help us pay interest on the money we borrowed to lend her—whereupon Britain is through.

Then followed the debacle—provisions for a similar cancellation of every other foreign debt due us, evidently upon the ground that having canceled Britain's debt, that of our strongest debtor, we could hardly ask any other nation to accept less favorable terms.

THE BRITISH DEBT

Not quite two-thirds of Britain's debt was due to wartime loans. The remainder resulted from loans made after hostilities had ceased. The total debt was $4,715,000,000—more than four thousand seven hundred millions of dollars—so huge a sum as to be almost incomprehensible.

In our settlement with Great Britain we agreed to forgive our debtor—to shoulder this huge debt in her place—provided she would pay us annually the equivalent of 3.7 per cent interest on its face for a period of 62 years. Then Britain is to be through.

So we have kissed good-bye to $4,715,000,000. It is dead horse for us. Every dollar loaned Britain we borrowed, we still owe, and are paying interest thereon.

As a consequence we will have paid by next July, in interest alone, to carry Britain's debt some $532,000,000 more than Britain will have paid us all together since the British debt settlement in 1923.

Our loss in principal and interest on account of this debt alone will exceed five thousand millions by the end of this year—more than 90 per cent of which we are yet to pay out of future taxation. Moreover, there are further interest losses to come.

THE ITALIAN DEBT

Italy's war debt to the United States was $1,349,000,000. However, that is not all. After the last gun was fired in the Great War our Treasury, like the good Santa Claus it was, kept right on loaning Italy as though the war were still on. This postwar debt amounted to $801,000,000, making Italy's total debt on June 15, 1925, $2,150,000,000 plus.

Every dollar we loaned Italy was borrowed from our people and remains unpaid. As a consequence it will have cost the United States in interest alone to carry this Italian debt to the end of the present fiscal year, next July—a period of seven years—some $624,000,000.

Now, mark you, all Italy will have helped us out during that time is a total of about $39,600,000. The difference of the two sums will be our net cost of carrying this Italian debt for but seven years, or approximately $585,000,000.

Italy would have paid us $14,706,000 more this year except for the moratorium.

Could Italy have paid more?

Last year she expended in armaments (military, naval, and air) $245,000,000, as against $142,000,000 in 1913—$103,000,000 more.

Italy's debt settlement is equivalent to the cancellation of the principal sum of her debt of $2,150,000,000 and the ultimate payment in lieu thereof of only 1⅛ per cent interest annually on the face of that debt for 62 years. Then Italy stops paying, the principal sum of her debt having been canceled.

Should we do more for Italy? Is it not about time we should think of the people of the United States? Why such a settlement? It was based on the high-sounding theory of ability to pay. There had to be some excuse for such indefensible generosity.

THE FRENCH DEBT

Our entry into the Great War was preceded by desperate appeals for aid from those who subsequently became our allies.

To save France from the invader we landed 2,000,000 young men upon her shores. However, their equipment and supplies were refused entry without the payment of French tariffs.

War or no war, sentiment did not interfere with the French Government's business instinct. The matter was adjusted by our agreeing to sell nothing during our stay in France.

Of course, encampments for our boys were necessary, and trenches where they fought and died. However, for these we paid rent and damages. Such is the back stage and irony of war!

When the conflict was over, our boys returned, save their fallen comrades; but there remained behind our railroad equipment and the improvements we had made, besides mountains of food and other supplies.

Unfortunately for us, however, because of our agreement respecting tariff duties, there was but one customer for these "leftovers"—the French Government.

Therefore, this $2,000,000,000 worth of property was turned over to France for promises to pay $400,000,000, since canceled, as hereafter indicated.

Prior to the armistice, while the enemy was driving on Paris, we loaned, upon the solemn promise of France to repay, tremendous sums, aggregating at the time of her debt settlement $2,662,000,000. But that is not all. After the war was over, upon her pleadings for further assistance, her debt was increased by further loans, including property purchased and interest, to a total of $4,231,000,000. France with great reluctance finally ratified a debt settlement, which provided:

First. For wiping off the slate this debt of $4,231,000,000; that is, its cancellation.

Second. For the payment in lieu thereof of the equivalent of 2⅛ per cent interest only on the face of this canceled debt annually for 62 years; France then to be free and clear of all obligations to the United States.

This means the shifting of the payment of this $4,231,000,000 from France to the shoulders of our people.

Moreover, from the date of this settlement to the end of the present fiscal year it will have cost the American people to carry this debt, in interest alone, $1,228,000,000.

In the meantime, however, the payments made by France will have totaled but $200,000,000, resulting in a net interest deficit, for us to bear also, of $1,028,000,000 for the seven years.

Thus, the American people will be out of pocket by July next, so far as this French debt is concerned, approximately $5,260,000,000. Moreover, in years to come this huge loss will be added to, bending the backs of American children yet unborn.

Mr. President, I request unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD at this point the interpretative resolution respecting the indebtedness of France to the United States, adopted by the United States Senate June 19, 1929.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The resolution is as follows:

Whereas an indebtedness of the French Republic to the United States in respect of the purchase of surplus war supplies in the amount of $400,000,000 is due and payable on August 1, 1929; and

Whereas the payment of such indebtedness is provided for in the agreement (known as the Mellon-Berenger agreement) made on behalf of the United States by the World War Foreign Debt Commission and approved by the President, providing for the funding and payment of the entire indebtedness of the French Republic to the United States, which agreement, treating all payments by France as applied to interest, is equivalent (1) to the cancellation of such indebtedness and the accrued interest thereon as of June 15, 1925, totaling $4,230,777,000; and, in addition, (2) to the cancellation of all interest accruing on said indebtedness from and after June 15, 1925, except the equivalent of an annual payment for 62 years of approximately 2.17 per cent on said $4,230,777,000; and

Whereas such agreement specifically provides that it shall not become effective until ratified in France and until approved by the Congress; and

Whereas the ratification in France of such agreement, in accordance with the terms thereof, is now under consideration: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That in the passage of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 80) authorizing the postponement of the date of maturity of the principal of the indebtedness of the French Republic to the United States in respect of the purchase of surplus war supplies, the Senate places upon it an interpretation in conformity with the terms of the preamble above set forth.

TWELVE OTHER DEBTS

Mr. HOWELL. The moratorium now in effect is for all of the war-worn nations except the United States. This is because every moratorium requires a goat; and, so far as Europe is concerned, Uncle Sam has proven the champion goat of all times. We borrowed money to loan these debtor nations. We must pay whether the debtor nations pay us or not. They are not to pay anything this year because of the moratorium, and hope to pay nothing next year or thereafter.

Besides Great Britain, Italy, and France, there are 12 other European nations indebted to Uncle Sam, none of which, excepting 5, has been the beneficiary of German reparations. These 12 nations are Austria, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, Estonia, Finland, Greece, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Rumania, and Yugoslavia.

The loans to these 12 debtor nations, excepting Belgium, were made after hostilities ceased. They were for food supplies, for the mitigation of unemployment, and for reconstruction; and more than half of Belgium's borrowings were also postarmistice loans.

Not one of these nations requested a moratorium, nor did any other nation, for that matter. These debts, totaling $994,000,000 plus, have been canceled, except that the debtors, taken together, have agreed to pay us the equivalent of 2⅜ per cent interest annually on this $994,000,000 for 62 years. Then they are through. We must pay the $994,000,000 ourselves. But that is not all. Since the dates of settlement of these various debts we have paid in interest on an equal amount of our outstanding bonds properly representing these debts, some $222,000,000 more than the total payments that will have been made to us by these debtor nations prior to July 1, 1932. Moreover, this interest deficit will keep on increasing as the years pass—yet we are called "Shylocks"!

THE 15 EUROPEAN DEBTS AS A WHOLE

We are, indeed, easy. When European negotiators came to Washington to settle their war debts we did not insist on their agreeing to pay those debts in full, together with the interest we were paying because of them.

We did not even insist they should agree to pay such interest for a reasonable period of time, even though the principal sums of the debts were to be canceled. We complacently settled with them on this basis:

Their debts, exceeding $12,000,000,000—or, to be exact, $12,090,667,000—were canceled, the debtor nations agreeing merely to help us out in paying interest on the money we had borrowed to loan them. Yes; and all they are to pay, taken together, is the equivalent of less than 2⅜ per cent interest annually for 62 years on this $12,000,000,000. Then they are through. We must pay the $12,000,000,000 without help, and also the difference between this 2⅜ per cent interest and the interest we are paying on the money we borrowed to loan them.

On this account alone our interest charges on $12,000,000,000 of our bonds outstanding, bearing the highest rates of interest, have been averaging $500,000,000 a year—and there is no such thing as a moratorium for us. All that these debtors paid us last year was $235,000,000.

This year they were to pay us $247,000,000, less than half the interest we must pay; but the moratorium has also shifted this $247,000,000 to our shoulders, temporarily at least.

The net cost to us of carrying these debts from their dates of settlement up to the end of this moratorium—less than eight years, as an average—will exceed in interest alone the total payments of every kind and nature made by our European debtors by more than $2,365,000,000. Do you wonder a deficit has overtaken our Treasury?

These twelve billions of debts, plus interest deficits accrued, are equivalent to an empire approximating the assessed valuation of Minnesota and 12 additional States west of the Missouri River.

And so important to us, our children, and our children's children is even the partial interest which the debtors have promised to pay that we should indeed ponder well and weigh these settlements, that we may determine, each for himself, whether or not we shall insist upon Europe's continuing to help us pay interest on our huge borrowings because of these debts, or whether we shall further relieve these debtor nations by more reductions in the partial interest they have agreed to pay or shoulder the whole burden ourselves.

"But," you may ask, "can these European nations pay?"

Last year these debtor nations spent some $1,600,000,000 on armaments, or about four hundred and thirty million more than was expended annually prior to the war.

Mr. President, though called Shylocks, we have not oppressed these debtors—as a matter of fact, our generosity in connection with these debts has no parallel in all history—nor should we oppress a debtor; neither should we hesitate, in dealing with Europe, to apply the rules of business to which we daily submit in dealing with each other.

Therefore, we should say to our European debtors, in unmistakable language, that no more concessions will be made respecting the amounts due; that no further moratoriums will be considered; that we expect them to pay regularly on the dates fixed and subject to the conditions set forth in their respective refunding agreements; that if inability to pay the full amount due in any case is satisfactorily demonstrated, then partial payment shall be made, with definite provisions for taking care of arrears.

Also, we should say that, so far as we are concerned, there is no other middle ground between payment and repudiation; and, finally, that if we must shoulder the whole burden of debt in any case—notwithstanding this reasonable attitude, and our past generosity—it is our firm determination that our people shall garner at least the benefits of the lesson which repudiation will indelibly impress.

AGRICULTURAL CONDITIONS

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, this morning there came to my desk a letter from the president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America. The letter is signed by H. I. Harriman, president of that organization. It inclosed two resolutions in regard to agriculture. The letter is dated May 26, and reads:

At the twentieth annual meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, held last week in San Francisco, there was evidenced marked interest in national policies with reference to agriculture.

Herewith I am sending you copies of a resolution under the heading "Agriculture," and another resolution under the heading "Credit for agriculture." It is our hope that these expressions of views of business men may have your sympathetic interest and support.

I exhibit to the Senate the two little resolutions they sent—a little single page on "agriculture" and another single page on "credit for agriculture."

This morning there also came to my desk another letter from the same president of the same Chamber of Commerce of the United States in regard to the Glass banking bill, S. 4412, which is the unfinished business of the Senate. He sends a brief prepared by a committee of the National Chamber of Commerce on this banking bill, suggesting some changes and some recommendations in regard to that bill. The brief was on stationery of the size I now exhibit to the Senate, and contains 70 some pages.

The Chamber of Commerce of the United States are seventy times more interested in the banking business than they are in the agricultural situation that confronts the Nation to-day.

I desire to read some of their statements in these resolutions that they have adopted. They are very illuminating, to say the least, coming as they do from the parent organization of the business organizations of the United States, with headquarters here in the National Capital.

The resolution entitled "Credit for Agriculture" closes with this statement:

Legislation should encourage the formation of agricultural credit corporations of a type which will attract substantial capital.

All parts of the Federal farm-loan system should be enabled to deal with their related institutions on a basis that will permit the latter to make loans at rates in harmony with credit conditions in the areas which they serve.

Mr. President, the Chamber of Commerce of the United States are interested, in connection with agricultural credits, in providing interest rates that will make a profit to their own people. That is what it is interested in.

In the resolution on agriculture they say:

American agriculture must be made more generally and dependably prosperous than in recent years.

It does not take the president of a national chamber of commerce to tell the Members of Congress that agriculture should be more prosperous. "It must be made more prosperous than it has been in recent years." There has been no prosperity in agriculture in recent years. They go on to say:

The national objective can not be obtained by experimentation, the losses of which, however heavy for the public, are most burdensome for agriculture itself.

They go on to intimate, in a nice way, that the Farm Board and the marketing act have proven disastrous to agriculture, and they openly recommend that the farm marketing act should be repealed. They also say, in their last paragraph:

Such action will prepare the way for a united national effort to obtain a national agricultural policy worthy of the place agriculture occupies and should continue to occupy in the United States.

Mr. President, I submit the National Chamber of Commerce has never gone officially on record for any worthwhile agricultural legislation in the history of the United States. To the contrary, it has opposed every worthwhile measure that the farmers believed would be for their interest. When a compromise measure was passed, known as the farm marketing act, and the Federal Farm Board was appointed by the President of the United States, with Mr. Legge as chairman of the board, and the board, in carrying out the mandates of Congress, in trying to stabilize the marketing of farm products, pegged the price of wheat and attempted to do the same thing with cotton, and attempted to raise the price levels and to stabilize the prices of other farm products, the representatives of the grain interests and the cotton interests came to the National Capital from the great grain and cotton centers of the Nation in opposition to the attitude of the Farm Board and against the farm marketing act.

What did they do? With the help of Mr. Barnes, who was at that time president of the National Chamber of Commerce, they lined up the National Chamber of Commerce against the Farm Board and against the marketing act. They went to the White House, and what was the result? The Farm Board was apparently called off, and its pegging of wheat prices began to cease, and the stabilization of the market began to slacken up, because the National Chamber of Commerce opposed it, because the heads of the great business interests of this Nation, who claim to be so interested in agriculture, were in opposition to the Farm Board and the farm marketing act.

Now they recommend the repeal of the farm marketing act. That is the only law on the statute books of the United States that would tend to promote agriculture under cooperative methods. I am satisfied that measure is not what it should be, that it should be strengthened and given more backing than it has.

Mr. President, if the National Chamber of Commerce were as much interested in agriculture as in the banking interests and other business interests, the farmers to-day would not be in the plight in which they find themselves.

My colleague tried to get a unanimous-consent agreement for the consideration of Senate bill 4536 and Senate bill 1197, which are now on the calendar, agricultural bills, and that was objected to because, the Senator from Pennsylvania says, we should not single out a single bill or two bills to be considered. It is not a case of singling out one or two bills to be considered, it is a case of singling out agriculture for consideration by the United States Senate before we adjourn.

The farmers of this Nation have gone broke by millions during recent years, and they are still going broke. Business interests are going broke along with them. A few of us have tried to tell the Members of the Senate for the last 10 years that unless something were done for agriculture, to put agriculture on a paying basis, the business interests would go down along with agriculture; and they have gone down.

The purchasing power of the farmers and the people who depend upon the farmers for their welfare has gone down, until they have no purchasing power left. The result has been that factories and mills all over the Nation have closed, and they will stay closed until something is done to put agriculture on a paying basis and restore the purchasing power of the people.

There are more workers on the farms of this Nation than there are in all other kinds of industry, and they do more important work, because they produce the food products to feed the people of this Nation. Yet Congress sits idly by and permits the farmers to continue to go broke, their farms and their homes to be foreclosed upon and taken away from them by the millions throughout the Nation, because the Congress of the United States is not willing to take action to prevent those foreclosures.

A moratorium of the war debts, oh, yes, for the benefit of the international bankers, and a $2,000,000,000 credit corporation for the benefit of the business interests; the Glass-Steagall bill for the benefit of more of our business interests, and again the Glass banking bill, now pending, for the benefit of the bankers. And what have we for the benefit of agriculture?

There are two bills on our calendar, Senate bill 1197 and Senate bill 4536, which the farm organizations of the country are backing. Our distinguished leader did not remember what Senate bill 1197 pertained to. He has received a number of communications from farmers in Indiana, and not only do the letters come from farmers in that State, but from all through the Nation they have indorsed the bill, which provides for the refinancing of the existing indebtedness of the farmers, to save the homes and the land of the farmers, and to enable our American farmers to continue as home owners, and not permit them to be made tenants and serfs, as they are becoming to-day.

Unless we can have an understanding in the very near futural that these agricultural measures are to be given consideration at this session, I intend to join with the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] in his attempt to bring to the attention of the country and of the Senate every day—and I think there are a number of others here who will join in the effort, if necessary—the needs of agriculture, the fact that we must have legislation to save agriculture.

Mr. President, if the Members of the United States Congress were as much interested in the people who produce the food products to feed the Nation as they are in other business interests, we would have legislation over night for the benefit of agriculture.

ATTENDANCE OF SENATORS

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, very rarely do I obtain the floor to take any notice of what is said in any newspaper, but last night in some papers, and throughout the press this morning there appear comments under glowing headlines about the failure of the Members of the Senate to be present at 10 o'clock yesterday morning, when we were to begin our early sessions. I find the following headline:

Curtis bangs gavel to open session; empty seats respond.

That is from one of the notable publications of the country, over a press dispatch sent out by one of the outstanding news agencies, and it is not different from the dispatches sent out by all of the news agencies. It even became the subject of feature writing of special correspondents.

This article states:

A Senate consisting entirely of empty seats was called to order to-day by Vice President CURTIS.

The daily session began at the unusually early hour of 10 a. m., in an effort to expedite the passage of tax legislation.

That is a correct statement.

Not a Senator was visible as the hands of the clock touched the hour of 10 and the vice presidential gavel fell.

A page went running for Senator FESS, of Ohio, the Republican whip.

Arriving a few seconds after 10, he said, "I suggest the absence of a quorum."

The Vice President and FESS smiled at each other. A page boy yawned sleepily. The clerk began to call the roll, and the bells rang frantically throughout the Capitol and office building to summon the tardy Senators.

That is a very newsy item, and the situation was such as to furnish copy for the bright newspaper boys, and from that standpoint it is not subject to criticism. But it does convey an impression throughout the country which will not be corrected by the press, but can only be set straight through the records of this body. The impression is given that the Members of this body are tardy, indifferent, unsolicitous of the welfare of the people, with not sufficient regard for the public interest to be present when the Senate convenes.

Those with any acquaintance with the actual situation, as, for example, the boys in the press gallery, understand the situation, and such articles to them are nothing more than humorous; but, unfortunately, the people back in the country, all throughout the Nation, do not get that impression. They will get the impression I have alluded to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. It may also be stated that we were in session night before last until 15 minutes after 9 o'clock——

Mr. FESS. That is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. And that in order that the Finance Committee might be able to make certain recommendations so that the program might be considered on yesterday, the Committee on Finance, which consists of 20 Senators, was called to meet at 8.30 o'clock yesterday morning.

Mr. FESS. That is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. We did meet, and there was a very full attendance of the Finance Committee, and we considered some 10 or 12 amendments. I suppose all the members of the Finance Committee were late in getting into the Senate, because we were over in the Office Building engaged in trying to arrange the program for the day.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Mississippi for adding that statement, because I want the country to know the situation and to know what Senators are doing. That is the only reason why I have spoken this morning.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. KING. The correspondents in the press gallery know, and the country ought to know, that every morning many committees of the Senate are in session; indeed, many committees begin their hearings at 10 o'clock, and some committees continue their sessions until 4 or 5 o'clock in the afternoon. I know that on some days Senators have three or four committee meetings to attend, and the committees sit during the time the Senate is in session. Many of the Members of the Senate who attend those committee hearings come to the floor of the Senate when some important discussion is taking place, or when the roll is called, or when a vote is to be taken upon an important matter.

Mr. FESS. That is correct, and it is that information which I want to have the country receive.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. WATSON. Supplementing what the Senator from Utah has said, the morning to which this article refers——

Mr. FESS. Yesterday morning.

Mr. WATSON. I personally know of seven committees which were in session, and which met before 10 o'clock. Of course, those in attendance on committee meetings do not leave the committee rooms and hasten to the Senate Chamber to be here exactly at the hour when the Senate convenes, and Senators did not get here at 10 o'clock yesterday morning, but as soon as the Senator from Ohio demanded the presence of a quorum and the call was made, 70 Senators responded, and were in their seats by six minutes after 10 o'clock.

Mr. FESS. That is correct. We have before us, Mr. President, a bill containing over 1,000 sections, which touches every sensitive business in the United States. No section of that bill can be passed over lightly. Every section is the result of most careful constructive thought. It is impossible, in the consideration of a measure of this kind to get quick action, final action, and much time must be given to the consideration of the provisions of the measure. While the bill is thus being considered, individual Senators can not be criticized for presenting other phases that are not in the bill, but which they might feel they would want to attach to the bill as amendments, such as we have heard mentioned here this morning.

For example, here it is now 11 o'clock. We have been in the Chamber an hour. There has not been a wasted moment this morning, although the subjects discussed were not the subjects directly in the bill. But every subject discussed was presented by Senators who are intent on the situation before us as it affects their particular sections of the country.

Such a procedure is not subject to criticism. We have been in continual session on this bill for many weeks with scarcely a minute of wasted time, except I think probably we might with some truth say that at some of the evening sessions there was more or less oratory which, while it edified, was not specifically upon the bill. It was for that reason the suggestion was made that we meet earlier in the day, at 10 o'clock in the morning, and not remain in session in the late evening, since in a session from 8 to 10 in the evening it is almost impossible to get votes on the bill, because the temptation is too great for addressing the Senate and the occupants of the crowded galleries. I think that criticism might be made, but it is not a serious one.

On the other hand, the Senate has been in constant session, meeting at 11 o'clock in the morning and running until 10 o'clock or later at night without interruption, and then just a day or two ago changing our hour of meeting to 10 a. m., and agreeing to remain in session until 7.30 in the evening, continuously and without interruption. I think the inference that is sent out is not only not justifiable but it is terribly dangerous in producing the wrong kind of public sentiment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. REED. Is not what the Senator is complaining about just plain human nature? It is not the fault of the men in the press gallery. If they send home dispatches that Senator So-and-so is a highly intelligent and faithful public servant and working 15 hours a day, no newspaper would print it; and if a newspaper did print it, nobody would read it. If somebody came to the Senator from Ohio 10 minutes from now and told him that such and such a Senator is a very able man and is working very hard and doing fine work, I suspect the Senator from Ohio would yawn and wish that he could turn to something else. But if he came to the Senator from Ohio and told him that Senator So-and-so had committed a questionable offense, the Senator from Ohio would not yawn, but he would listen. That is just human nature. What is the use complaining about it?

Mr. FESS. Probably there is no need of complaining in this presence. I do not do it for that purpose. All I have in mind is that the people back home who are complaining about our negligence and our indifference are making a complaint that is largely stimulated by dispatches like the one to which I have referred. I agree with the Senator from Pennsylvania that it is no news that a Senator leaves his hotel at 7 o'clock in the morning and opens his office at a very early hour and attempts to direct his correspondence up to 10 o'clock, the hour of the convening of the Senate—a correspondence so voluminous that it becomes necessary for him to add two or three additional clerks in his office to answer the correspondence relating directly to the pending bill. That is no news.

Mr. REED. If we did tell them that, they would only answer that they did not force us to take the position of United States Senator, but that we sought it and we ought not to complain of the work into which we forced ourselves. But there is no good result to follow complaining. I have made a pest of myself in the Senate for years over the sales tax, and yet just yesterday I received a telegram from a very highly intelligent Philadelphian asking why I do not take an interest in the proposal for a manufacturers' sales tax. [Laughter.] There is no use complaining. Let us get back to work on the bill.

Mr. FESS. Probably the Senator from Ohio is now the greatest offender because he has risen in his place over the protest of the chairman of the Finance Committee [Mr. SMOOT], who at this very instant is standing in his place in his towering influence indicating to me every second, "Please sit down so we can get to work." Of course I understand that, but the people back home are coming to the conclusion that of all the governmental agencies we now possess, the most useless is the United States Senate. It is such press dispatches as I have referred to that are feeding and encouraging that opinion; and while the correction will not be made in the press, it will be read by the few people who read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. That is why I am making the correction.

He also presented a telegram from Walter P. GRASSHOPPER PLAGUE IN THE NORTHWEST

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, the grasshopper pest of the Northwest is threatening to devastate a half dozen States. The magnitude of this plague is such that farmers and localities are unable to deal with it. Therefore, the Department of Agriculture authorized an appropriation of a million and a half dollars, which item is contained in the agricultural appropriation bill, on which no final action has been taken. The situation is serious from the standpoint of the farmer. The Government also stands to suffer heavy losses, because it is in this area that so many seed loans were made. The Government holds crop security and expects to make collections from the crop which is now being threatened.

I ask, Mr. President, that several telegrams with reference to this matter be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the telegrams were referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PIERRE, S. DAK., May 14, 1932.

Senator PETER NORBECK,
Washington, D. C.:

I am advised by Professors Severin and Ford, of State entomology department, that grasshopper situation in our State is becoming serious. Grasshopper eggs now hatching by the million, and it is estimated that in eight weeks' time they will begin to damage crops. Every day's delay will mean inability to destroy these pests. Please use every effort to secure early passage of appropriation bill.

WARREN GREEN,
Governor of South Dakota.

LAKE ANDES, S. DAK., May 18, 1932.

Senator PETER NORBECK:

Grasshopper scourge here appalling. Immediate help, or crops total loss.

G. F. KANE, Editor Wave.

HURON, S. DAK., May 18, 1932.

Senator PETER NORBECK:

For your information bankers sending us discouraging reports re grasshopper prospects, saying they are hatching in great numbers than this time last year, and unless something miraculous happens looks like seed-loan money wasted in worst section. Comments by counties follow: Brule County, this year's hatch greater and weather not detrimental, imperative help at once; Charles Mix County, looks like worse grasshopper outbreak than last year, unless we have abundance of cold, rainy weather; Haakon County, it does not look as though weather had retarded hopper hatching, we will need hopper poison soon; Gregory County, countless hoppers hatching, and if something is not done they will clean this country again; Stanley County, cold weather did not retard hoppers, and indications are more than last year; Jerauld County, indications for serious outbreak hoppers; Hughes County, with plenty of rain believe difficulty small, dry season would make trouble; Jones County, big hatch hoppers already out, and with favorable conditions will be worse than last year, because hatching two weeks earlier than last year this section; Jackson County, more grasshoppers than last year this time, and unless stopped will take all crops; Sully County, hoppers hatching enormous numbers all over county, many fields literally covered with tiny hoppers, and will require at least $45 worth of poison per farm, or $27,000, to save a crop worth two millions at present prices.

SOUTH DAKOTA BANKERS ASSOCIATION.

VERMILION, S. DAK., May 25, 1932.

Secretary HYDE, Senator NORBECK, and Representative CHRISTOPHERSON (deliver to Senator NORBECK, Washington):

The grasshopper menace in this county is becoming more serious each day. Hoppers have been hatching by the millions for three weeks. It appears that the only way to save crops is by poisoning the hoppers on a county-wide basis. Farmers themselves are unable to finance such procedure. With 565 Federal loans in this county of 1,200 farmers, it would seem like good business for the Government to provide some means of saving the crops and protecting their interest.

Con S. Maddox, County Agent; Citizens' Bank; First National Bank; the Plain Talk; County Red Cross; Senator Chausee; Representative Partridge; Olaf Paulson; Chairman County Committee, Dakota Republican; President Clay, County Farm Bureau.

LOANS MADE BY SHIPPING BOARD

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I have a table prepared by Mr. John Nicolson, formerly connected with the Shipping Board. It relates to loans made by the board. I likewise have a statement prepared by the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] touching the table and the facts reflected therein.

On behalf of the senior Senator from Tennessee, who is necessarily absent on account of illness, I ask that the table and his statement be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

The table and statement are as follows:

Statement of loans by the United States Shipping Board at interest rates lower than 3½ per cent

[Compiled, May, 1932, from official statements of the board, by John Nicolson]

NOTE.—Such rates as one-fourth of 1 per cent, three-eighths of 1 per cent, one-half of 1 per cent, seven-eighths of 1 per cent, 1 per cent, and others less than the 3½ per cent minimum now fixed by law are claimed to result from section 301 of the merchant marine act, 1928. A reasonable interpretation of that section does not, we think, result in any such consequences. (See note at end). Furthermore, whether a loan should be made was discretionary with the board. If the applicant was unwilling to pay a reasonable rate, by contract, the loan could have been denied. All know that Congress did not intend the interpretation which was applied. (See notes inserted through the tabular statement.)

33. A group of loans aggregating $17,600,000.

The interest-loss column above relates, of course, only to the loans listed above, and which, as indicated in the caption, are all at less than 3½ per cent.

It is a fact, as certified to Congress by the Annual Report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the average interest cost of money borrowed by the United States on interest is about 0.03917 per cent.

To the foregoing, therefore, may be added as a group other "obligations" bearing rates lower than 0.03917 per cent. The interest loss in these, in the aggregate, exceeds an additional $600,000.

[1] See "Note."

RECAPITULATION AND SUPPLEMENTAL COMMENT

1. The total amount of loans made at interest rates ranging from one-fourth per cent to 3⅜ per cent exceeds $111,250,000.

2. The loss to the United States on interest account alone for these loans will be: (a) When compared with 3½ per cent rate, now prescribed as a minimum, over $18,000,000; (b) when compared with 0.039 per cent, the average interest cost of the public debt of the United States, it will exceed $22,000,000.

3. These interest rates were one-fourth per cent, three-eighths per cent, one-half per cent, seven-eighths per cent, 1 per cent, 1¼ per cent, 1½ per cent, 1⅞ per cent, etc. The record reveals the public officials concerned recognized that Congress never intended the grant of such low rates; and that (if these rates are legal) the United States is therefore the victim of complex language and highly technical rules controlling its application.

4. Basis of such rates: It is claimed that the use of such low rates was due solely to that language of the law (sec. 301 d m. m. act 1928) reading: "During any period in which the vessel is operated in foreign trade the rate shall be the lowest rate of yield * * * of any Government obligation * * * outstanding at the time the loan is made by the board."

5. Departures from this test: Notwithstanding the explanation thus given, there appear in the list above the following variations in the tests or rules applied: (a) Some loans, though made subsequent to the 1928 act, entirely ignored this language of the law, and by its voluntary act expressly agreed on and fixed the rate of interest in the loan agreement, without certification of interest rate from the Secretary of the Treasury and without respect to any test or "yield" (on whatever basis interpreted) prescribed in the law. Among these are the loans mentioned above in items 5, 6, 24, 25, and 26.

(b) Not only was the interest test prescribed in the law thus entirely ignored, but the rate of interest thus voluntarily fixed by the board (not by accident or by oversight but by formal resolution dealing specifically with the interest rate) was so low as the abnormal rate of one-half of 1 per cent per annum—and that for a period of 20 years! The average rate on the public debts of the United States is nearly eight times that rate. See items 5 and 6 above.

(c) When the test prescribed in the law was used, it was applied by the board with basic variations of interpretation, e. g.: (1) Sometimes as in items 14, 16, 17, 20, 21, 22, above, the rate was determined by the "coupon" interest rate of the security used as a test, i. e., the rate of interest the obligation yielded on the basis of its initial sale by the United States when issued; in other words, the rate paid by the Government. (2) On the other hand, the board sometimes applied a rate, as in items 1, 2, 3, 4, 10, 12, 13, 18, and others, which rate was determined by the market price of the obligation used as a test as of the day the loan was made and as revealed in transactions between third persons, hence having no bearing whatever in determining or revealing the interest cost of that obligation to the United States. In item 1, for instance, the "obligation" bore on its face and (as it was issued at par) actually cost the United States an interest rate of 3½ per cent, and yet it was certified in support of an interest rate of one-fourth of 1 per cent—at a time when the public debt of the United States was costing the Government nearly 16 times that rate.

6. Although the law used complex terms in prescribing an interest test, it made possible an application of the rule of reason by also providing immediately following the complex language (sec. 301 d): "The board may prescribe rules for determining the amount of interest payable under the provisions of this paragraph"; thus supplementing the control resulting from the fact that the grant of any loan was wholly discretionary. The board, however, did not enact any rule covering the point.

7. Secretary of Treasury's recommendation: The Secretary, believing that the rates certified were not in accord with the intent and policy of Congress, suggested that the board arrange the loans on the basis of contract-interest rate and thus obtain a reasonable and a substantially uniform rate. The board explains its abandonment of this suggestion by a legal opinion from the Attorney General, which on its face expressly mentions it is "informal." Assuming it had been a formal opinion, intended as a basis of final action, the fact remains that such judicial or quasi-judicial bodies as the Interstate Commerce Commission and the United States Shipping Board are not, for reasons too obvious for comment, subject to or estopped by rulings or opinions of the Attorney General; hence responsibility can not be transferred to the Department of Justice. Such quasi-judicial bodies are charged with direct interpretation of laws affecting matters in their jurisdiction, subject only to judicial decisions as precedents and subject to reversal only by the courts when wrong.

8. Although the above-mentioned opinion is cited by the board in support of the procedure it followed, resulting in these abnormal rates, that opinion deals only with the right of the board to impress a higher rate on the borrower and does not remotely negative the right of the board to refuse the loan; nor is it inconsistent with the applicant availing himself of the fundamental right of a citizen to waive a provision of civil law for his benefit and enter into contract obligations accordingly—a basic right which obviously underlaid the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury.

9. The time the loan is made: These abnormal rates are also attributed to the chance factor resulting from the board applying a rule that the "time the loan is made" meant the "day the vessel is completed and documented," and therefore the board had not been free to use the date of the loan agreement as the date of the loan, hence leaving the interest rate to the chance date of the physical completion of the vessel. The distinction is important. The exact date of the loan agreement was obviously in the control of the board. The exact date for the completion of the vessel was not only beyond the control of the board, it was under the control of the borrower. The exact date is important. To illustrate: (a) In item 14 the loan date is September 15, 1930. On that date certain obligations bearing 3½ per cent matured. On that date certain obligations bearing 2⅜ per cent were issued as substitutes. (b) Even if market rates are deemed the test, the technique of translating market quotations into interest yield is such that very slight fractional changes in market price cause important changes in the interest rate; that is, in item 1 an interest rate of ¼ per cent was certified. Had there been so slight a change in the market price as to change the yield by the very small fraction represented by the fifth decimal point (viz, change .00310 per cent to .00315 per cent), the Government would collect $66,000 more of interest. This is mentioned to reduce to an absurdity, from a practical viewpoint, the tests which have been applied.

10. The opinion partly ignored: These are the tests which the board emphasizes the Attorney General's informal opinion justified, and which it believed it was obligated to follow (but see par. 7 and 8 above). No explanation is suggested, however, why that opinion was deemed binding, that the Federal obligations should be the sole test; and yet was entirely ignored, in its second point, holding that the date the loan agreement was signed could be deemed the date or time the loan was made, and that the Secretary of the Treasury's certification could be as of that date, and the rate therefore embodied in the loan agreement, thus repudiating the practice of leaving to chance the date by which the rate was to be determined. Its attitude to this branch of the opinion is the more significant from the fact that previously it had quite uniformly used in the loan agreements of this group, the words: "At the time the loan is made," which are the words of the law, and which left room for subsequent interpretation.

The "opinion" is dated November 13, 1930. On January 8, 1931, it executed the two loan agreements mentioned in items 31 and 32 above, and in them used the words, in substitution of the above, "at the time of the completion and documentation of the vessel," thus introducing by contract stipulation the "chance factor" deprecated in paragraph 9. The use of these words was in direct opposition to the opinion cited by the board as binding on it in adhering to the use of the "yield" of certain Federal securities as the sole test for fixing the interest rate, and as explaining why it abandoned the very practical suggestion of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the rate be fixed by contract stipulation.

JOHN NICOLSON.

STATEMENT BY SENATOR M'KELLAR

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD as part of my remarks a statement of loans by the United States Shipping Board at interest rates lower than 3½ per cent compiled by Mr. John Nicolson, formerly connected with that board.

In this connection I beg to say that Mr. Nicolson, from the records of the board, shows the enormous loss to the Government of loans made by the board at such rates as one-fourth of a per cent, three-eighths of a per cent, one-half of a per cent, seven-eighths of a per cent, and 1 per cent, and other exceedingly small interest rates, such losses aggregating, on a computation on a basis of 3½ per cent paid by the Government, the enormous sum of $18,000,000, and when compiled with a 0.039 per cent average interest cost of the public debt of the United States the loss will exceed twenty-two billions of dollars.

This is a very carefully prepared statement. It gives the exact figures taken from the records. It shows that the pretended lowest interest rate was not followed by the board itself; that it was not necessary to make any such loans; that it was tremendously detrimental to the United States that such loans were made; that the loans at such rates were indefensible, and, in my judgment, no member of the board who was a party to the granting of such loans at such interest rates should be reappointed to the board or confirmed again by the Senate.

I invite the especial attention of every Senator to this very remarkable statement taken from the records, not only to be examined by Senators with respect to remedial legislation but also in connection with their votes on the confirmation of any member of the board responsible for such rates who may be up for confirmation. In my judgment, no member of the board who was responsible for these rates, directly or indirectly, should be confirmed by the Senate.

I again call the special attention of Senators to this statement, in view of the fact that Chairman T. V. O'Connor has been again renominated by the President and his nomination favorably reported by the committee and now on the calendar. I have asked that this nomination be held until I could be heard in the matter. I hope that some member of the Commerce Committee, in view of this remarkable record, will ask that the nomination be re-referred to the committee for its consideration in connection with this statement.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) making an additional appropriation for the payment of Army and Navy pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

AMERICAN-MEXICAN CLAIMS ARBITRATION

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, there is on the calendar a joint resolution, being Senate Joint Resolution 97, extending for one year the time within which American claimants may make application for payment, under the settlement of the war claims act of 1928, of awards of the Mixed Claims Commission and the Tri-Partite Claims Commission.

I find in the American Bar Association Journal a very interesting article on this subject entitled "The American-Mexican Claims Arbitration." I ask permission to have it printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the American Bar Association Journal, March, 1932]

THE AMERICAN-MEXICAN CLAIMS ARBITRATION—INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION FACED A TEST OF PRACTICABILITY IN EFFORTS OF UNITED STATES AND MEXICO TO SETTLE THE LARGE NUMBER OF CLAIMS ORIGINATING BETWEEN 1868 AND 1927 BEFORE INTERNATIONAL COMMISSIONS—BRIEF CONSIDERATION OF RESULTS

By John J. McDonald and Carlyle R. Barnett *

International arbitration has faced a test of practicability in the effort of the United States and Mexico to settle before international commissions the large number of claims of their respective nationals which had their origin between 1868 and 1927. From the record of cases decided during a period of seven years by the commissions established under the conventions of September 8 and 10, 1923, between these Governments, and commonly known as the General and Special Claims Commissions, it might reasonably be concluded that the work of those commissions has hardly begun; and yet the lives of those commissions have expired; and the machinery as previously assembled by the United States for the active conduct of this arbitration was dismantled on October 15, 1931. However, in the first deficiency bill of February 3, 1932, there was made available the amount of $50,000, the primary purpose of which apparently was to make provision for the closing up of the affairs of the American agency. It seems, therefore, to be an opportune time to consider briefly the results of this arbitration, the future of which is uncertain, from the points of view not only of its accomplishment in the settlement of claims but also of its contribution to the body of international law.

The background and terms of the conventions were considered in an address before the American Bar Association at Detroit on September 2, 1925, by the Hon. Charles Beecher Warren, who, with the Hon. John Barton Payne, represented the United States during the negotiations at the so-called Bucareli conferences of 1923, preceding the adoption of the conventions.[1] Following decisions by the General Claims Commission in several claims, a discussion of certain principles of international law as applied by that commission appeared in this Journal in 1928.[2]

The General Claims Convention of September 8, 1923, comprehended, with one exception, all claims of citizens of both countries which had arisen since July 4, 1868,[3] and which might arise within three years from the date of the first meeting of the General Claims Commission. This latter date became August 30, 1927.

The excepted claims were those of American citizens which arose during the revolutionary period in Mexico from 1910 to 1920, and which were due to acts of certain specifically designated forces. These claims, reserved from the jurisdiction of the general claims commission, were intrusted for decision under the special claims convention of September 10, 1923, to the special claims commission. It is to be particularly observed that other claims of tne excepted period which were not within the limited jurisdiction of the special claims commission were to be heard by the general claims commission. Mexico assumed responsibility ex gratia for the claims within the purview of the special claims commission, whereas as regards the claims to be decided by the general claims commission the accepted rules and principles of international law were to be applied. The existence of two commissions, each operating under its own convention, does not to any great extent complicate the consideration of this arbitration, as the activity of the special claims commission was confined to two brief periods—at the beginning and at the end of its life.

When the commissions assumed their duties in 1924, almost 60 years had elapsed since the last general arbitration with Mexico, and claims had arisen on both sides of the Rio Grande. They were confronted, therefore, with the task of deciding an uncertain number of claims within a period of a few years, the general claims commission within three years from the date of its first meeting, the special claims commission within five years. Furthermore, the general claims convention required that the filing of all claims, except those which might arise after September 8, 1923, be accomplished within one year from the first meeting of its commission, and as regards the special claims commission the period of two years was fixed. The impossibility of the Governments, preparing formal pleadings in all claims within those periods was at once recognized; and, therefore, resort was made by both commissions to the procedure of considering a formal filing of a claim as made on the submission by either Government of a memorandum setting forth the name and address of the claimant and the amount of and a brief statement of the facts of the claim. Under this procedure there were docketed some 4,900 separate American claims of an amount of approximately $686,000,000 and some 836 Mexican claims of an amount of approximately 245,000,000 pesos. It may be observed, however, that the preparation of formal pleadings and briefs was carried on continuously by the American and Mexican agencies after 1924, with the result that several hundred claims in all stages of development are now reposing in the files of the joint secretaries of the commissions. It was not until the second year of either commission's existence that the decision of claims was undertaken.

The claims initially filed with the General Claims Commission cover a wide field. The earliest claims in point of time were those which were based upon the losses of cattle in Texas during the early seventies of the last century at the hands of raiders from Mexico. As showing the varied character, claims involved bonds, collection of illegal taxes, Comisión Reguladora del Mercado de Henequen, concessions, contracts, currency, detention of ships and cargoes, expulsion, loans, loss of bank deposits, maltreatment in prison, mining rights, murders, postal money orders, rights in land and subsoil, and unlawful arrests. A large number of the Mexican claims were based on the complaint of Mexico that the United States had failed to carry out the provisions of the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo of 1848[4] in the protection of titles of property of Mexican citizens in Texas. Among other Mexican claims were those growing out of the occupation of Vera Cruz by American troops in 1914 and the Pershing Expedition in 1916. As may be anticipated, the claims filed with the Special Claims Commission account for approximately one-half of the American claims; for, as found by the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate in its investigation of Mexican affairs in 1920, 785 American citizens had been killed or wounded and property in the amount of approximately half a billion dollars had been lost or destroyed during the period of revolutions in Mexico.[5]

The Special Claims Commission held only two sessions at which claims were heard and decided on their merits: At the first, a decision was rendered on April 26, 1926, involving the murders of 17 American citizens by Villa adherents at Santa Isabel, Mexico, on January 10, 1916; at the second, the commission decided on April 24, 1931, a claim growing out of the murder of Hubert L. Russell in Mexico by Orozquistas on September 29, 1912. Both claims were disallowed, the American Commissioner in each instance dissenting.[6] As has been seen, Mexico assumed liability under the Special Claims Convention for the acts of a force only in the event that the force had a status specifically described in the convention. Therefore, the opinion of the commission in each case was primarily concerned with the determination of the status of the force which caused the loss or damage.

The commissioners who heard the Santa Isabel claims in 1926 were Dr. Rodrigo Octavio, of Brazil, presiding commissioner; Hon. Ernest B. Perry, American commissioner, and Dr. Fernando Gonzales Roa, Mexican commissioner. Neither Doctor Octavio nor Mr. Perry again sat as commissioners. Doctor Octavio resigned on July 9, 1926; and as his successor, Dr. Kristian Sindballe, of Denmark, was not appointed until June 16, 1928, for that period of nearly two years this commission was without a presiding commissioner. Doctor Sindballe resigned on July 1, 1929, without having attended a session of the commission, and his place was taken by Dr. Horacio F. Alfaro, recently designated Panamanian minister to the United States, who was appointed on May 27, 1930, and presided at the session at which the Russell claim was heard. Following the resignation of Mr. Perry from the Special Claims Commission on November 30, 1930, the Hon. Fred K. Nielsen, who was then serving as American commissioner on the General Claims Commission, was appointed in his place on January 6, 1931. It is to be observed that beginning with the appointment of Doctor Sindballe in 1928 the two commissions were virtually merged in that, while Doctors Sindballe and Alfaro were presiding commissioners each acted in that capacity upon both the General Claims Commission and the Special Claims Commission.

The results of the Special Claims Commission were, through inactivity, negligible. The General Claims Commission, on the other hand, held several sessions in Washington and Mexico City and rendered decisions in 148 claims, nine of these being Mexican claims. A question may arise as to the binding force of two of the decisions, since they were not rendered conformably with the rules of that commission. The total amount of awards, exclusive of interest, to American citizens in 89 cases was $2,599,166.10, the Mexican awards amounting in five cases to $39,000. The remaining 54 claims were disallowed. In connection with the amount awarded American claimants it is observed that one award was in the amount of $1,807,531.36, while another was for $140,000.[7]

The commissioners who first sat for the hearing of claims of the General Claims Commission were Dr. C. van Vollenhoven, of the Netherlands, presiding commissioner; the late Edwin B. Parker, American commissioner and Lic. G. Fernandez MacGregor, Mexican commissioner. On the resignation of Judge Parker, Doctor Nielsen, on July 31, 1926, was appointed American commissioner. Following the resignation on August 31, 1927, of Dr. van Vollenhoven, his successor, Dr. Kristian Sindballe, was not appointed until June 16, 1928. On his resignation on July 1, 1929, a lapse of nearly a year preceded Doctor Alfaro's appointment on May 27, 1930, as presiding commissioner.

In 1927, and again in 1929, the term originally assigned in the General Claims Convention of 1923 for the completion of the work of its commission was extended for periods of two years. In like manner the term assigned to the special claims commission under its convention was extended in 1929 for an additional two years, although no session had then been held since that of 1926 when a decision was rendered in the Santa Isabel claims. In August, 1931, the lives of both commissions came to an end without the Governments of the United States and Mexico having come to an agreement as to further extensions.

In a cursory consideration of the causes of the failure of the commissions to hear and decide a greater number of claims certain factors are obvious. Inaction for periods of 21 months in the case of the General Claims Commission and of 33 months in the case of the Special Claims Commission, due to the lack of presiding commissioners, is clearly not chargeable to the commissions. Moreover, after 1928, the commissions could not hold sessions simultaneously, as Doctors Sindballe and Alfaro were in turn presiding commissioners on both commissions. It is observed, however, that the General Claims Commission, while it had a presiding commissioner, did not hold meetings continuously, some of the delay being occasioned because sessions were held both in Washington and in Mexico City. An additional factor of importance which bears on the matter of expedition is the procedure under which the arbitration was conducted.

The documentary record of a fully pleaded and briefed claim consists of memorial, answer, reply, brief, reply-brief, and counter-brief. Since practically every claim decided was prepared for submission to either commission under this procedure, the issues were thus normally given detailed consideration in the written record. However, full oral argument, also, was permitted under the conventions the representatives of each government being authorized "to present to the commission, orally or in writing, all the arguments deemed expedient in favor of or against any claim."[8] Arguments are often not only desirable but also necessary; but as the argument of a single case before the commissions, in some instances, lasted for many days, and as, with few exceptions, every claim was vigorously contested, the number of claims which could be decided during a session consequently was limited. If compromises are not possible, and time for full argument is not available, each so-called national commissioner, being cognizant of the interests of his Government, may be relied upon, as shown by the dissenting opinions, to call for argument upon any point which he might desire to have developed further than is set forth in the written record.[9]

In connection generally with the procedure obtaining before arbitral commissions, it is interesting to note the statement of Doctor Nielsen in his searching address before the Federal Bar Association on February 4, 1930, which was printed in the Journal, and in which he said:

"* * * No progress has been made in the formulation of rules to promote expedition and economy. Little or no use has been made of the fruits of intensive experience in arbitration work. And yet assuredly nothing could be approximately more important in any endeavor for progress and improvement."[10]

From the point of view of the contribution of this arbitration to the body of international law, the 1,300 pages of opinions, rendered after arguments had been heard ad libitum, will remain as a source from which may be drawn thoroughly studied, and carefully reasoned statements on many points in the law of nations. In many of the cases, though there was agreement as to the decisions, separate expressions of views were given. The independence of thought of the commissioners is further shown by the 21 reported dissenting opinions, several of which are characterized by a vigorousness that is stimulating and by analysis and logic that overshadow the majority opinions. A glimpse at the opinions will be interesting.

During the long lapse of time between the arbitrations of 1868 and 1923 death had made inroads and records had been lost or destroyed. The General Claims Commission, appreciative of that situation, placed upon both Governments in its early sessions the duty of cooperating with it in searching out and presenting to it "all facts throwing any light on the merits of the claim presented,"[11] and it particularly pointed out that the rules as to burden of proof pertaining in domestic actions have no place in international procedure. Consideration of the sufficiency of evidence, which was solely documentary in character, consisting of official records, affidavits, contemporary correspondence, personal as well as diplomatic, and the like, holds a prominent place in the opinions. Due to the differences present in the legal systems of the United States and Mexico, the character of the evidence which should be submitted to sustain a contention presented perplexing questions. Mexico particularly objected to the presentation of affidavits and denied that, since affidavits are ex parte, any probative value should be attributed to the statements contained in them. The special, as well as the General Claims Commission, declined to adopt the Mexican position, and in compliance with the mandates of their conventions they were liberal in receiving evidence. However, to justify an award, both insisted that the evidence produced by the claimant Government be concrete and convincing.

A survey of the claims decided by the General Claims Commission, on submission by the agencies, discloses that a majority concern maltreatment in prison, murder, personal injury, robbery, and unlawful arrest and imprisonment. Denial of justice, therefore, occupies a prominent place in the opinions. Apart from the question presented in several of these claims, as to whether or not international responsibility was direct or indirect—a distinction the soundness of which some eminent authorites doubt—the bases of responsibility most frequently met were lack of diligence on the part of the respondent Government in apprehending wrongdoers or its failure to impose proper penalties upon them. To determine the existence of international responsibility the commission gave application, in the light of the facts of each case, to the broad test as to whether or not there was convincing evidence of a pronounced degree of improper governmental administration. In the awards made in these claims appears the effect of the decision of a majority of the commissioners in the claim of Laura M. B. Janes et al.,[12] in which the private individual's crime was separated from the Government's delinquency. In the light of that holding the commission allowed damages on the basis not of the loss caused by the act of the individual but of that occasioned through the sense of indignity, grief, and humiliation suffered through the failure of the Government to bring the wrongdoer to justice.[13]

Discussion of jurisdictional questions involving citizenship[14] and the extent of the commission's powers to entertain claims of the revolutionary period appear often in the opinions, but a claim which was considered by a majority of the General Claims Commission to turn on jurisdictional grounds, and to which particular attention was directed by that commission was that of the International Fisheries Co.[15] This claim was predicated upon the wrongful cancellation by Mexico, of a concession containing a so-called Calvo clause, which, in general, may be stated to make an alien a national for a particular purpose, to oblige the alien to have resort only to the national courts in the determination of his rights in connection with a contract, or the like, or to provide for a waiver by the alien of the diplomatic protection of his government as regards the contract, or the particular purpose. The presiding and Mexican commissioners, in a decision of July, 1931, in the Fisheries claim, reaffirmed an earlier decision of 1925, in the case of North American Dredging Co. of Texas[16] which related to a contract containing such a clause.[17] In the latter case the commission held that the claimant, under its contract, could not rightfully present the claim to its Government, since it had made no attempt to comply with a provision therein requiring the exhaustion of local remedies. Application was not given, in view of the claimant's contractual obligation, to Article V of the General Claims Convention in which the need to exhaust local remedies as a condition precedent to the allowance of a claim had been dispensed with by the two Governments. Consequently, the Fisheries claim was dismissed for lack of jurisdiction without prejudice to the right of the claimant to employ such other legal remedies as it may have elsewhere. It is interesting to note that the late Judge Parker concurred in the disposition of the Dredging Co. case.

In his dissenting opinion in the Fisheries case, Doctor Nielsen critically analyzed the majority opinions, as well as that in the case decided in 1926, and expressed himself in the following language with reference generally to the effect of the Calvo clause:

"* * * neither a nation's domestic legislation nor a contract it may make with a private individual or business concern can nullify another nation's right of interposition, secured by the supreme law of the members of the family of nations, nor nullify an international covenant. Whatever may be said of the ethical principles of an individual who takes action at variance with the terms of a contract he signs, his action can, of course, not result in setting aside either a nation's constitution or the law of nations."

The status of the administration of Gen. Victoriano Huerta, who succeeded to the Presidency at the conclusion of the tragic 10 days in Mexico City in February, 1913, came before the General Claims Commission, as constituted in 1926, in the claim of George W. Hopkins,[18] involving the nonpayment of postal money orders issued by Mexican post offices in the early part of 1914. In this claim the commission distinguished between the "personal" acts of the administration of President Huerta and the "unpersonal" acts of the Mexican Government. In imposing liability upon Mexico, the commission stated that the acceptance of money orders is a routine matter conducted by the governmental machinery in every country and is not affected by changes in higher administrative offices. It indicated that it would not impose liability upon Mexico for so-called "personal" acts of the Huerta administration which had for their purpose the maintenance of that administration in power.

A decision of importance is that in the case of Fanny P. Dujay[19] in which the commission held that the maxim of the common law, actio personalis moritur cum persona, could not properly be applied in an arbitral proceeding. Replying to the contention of Mexico that the claimant, the widow of Captain Dujay, could not recover for the losses and damages sustained by his wrongful imprisonment in Tampico, Mexico, in 1884, it pointed out that since the principle of survival of actions in the countries of the world is not uniform, international tribunals should not be precluded from making a final pronouncement on the merits of such a controversy because a limitation on rights of action might be existent in some particular system of local jurisprudence. It added, if such were the case—

"* * * Arbitration as the substitute for further diplomatic exchanges or forces would fail in its purpose. The unfortunate delays incident to the redress of wrongs by international arbitration are notorious. Injured persons often die before any redress is vouchsafed to them. A decision of this kind would seem to put a premium on such delays which would be conducive to the nullification of just claims."

Two cases of particular interest are those of the Northern Steamship Co. and the Oriental Navigation Co.,[20] which involved the question of the right of the de jure government to close by decree ports which were in the de facto control of insurgents during the De la Huerta revolution of 1923. No steps were taken to prevent ingress or egress by means of an effective blockade. A Mexican federal gunboat which appeared at Frontera compelled two ships of these American companies, which did not have clearance documents issued by the de jure authorities, to depart from that port before they had completed discharging and loading their cargoes. A majority of the commission took the position that as the Mexican gunboat partly commanded the port, the lawfulness of the action of the gunboat in "forcing off" these cargo ships, which were lacking in clearance documents, "can hardly be challenged."[21]

Doctor Nielsen, in a considered dissenting opinion, took a position which accords with the policy of the United States, and is supported by precedent, that effective blockade is necessary in the closure of a port in the control of insurgents.

As illustrative of other problems considered in the opinions of the General Claims Commission, there may be mentioned: The bases of translation of depreciated paper money in circulation during the revolutionary period in Mexico into United States currency,[22] the nonresponsibility of Mexico for the discharge by General Huerta of an American from his employment because of the occupation of Vera Cruz by American troops; [23] the responsibility of Mexico for its failure to afford special protection to an American consul who was wounded by an unidentified marauder after a threat of assassination in the event of the execution of Sacco and Vanzetti[24] and responsibility for the improper invalidation of postage stamps[25] legally issued.

As has been seen, awards were made to American claimants as early as 1926, but under Article IX of both conventions the United States would not receive from Mexico the amount of any awards until the conclusion of the proceedings of the commissions. That amount when received, under the act of Congress of February 26, 1896 (29 Stat. L. 32) would be held by the Government as a trustee for the claimants. The Hon. MORRIS SHEPPARD introduced in the United States Senate on January 6, 1930, a bill S. 3725) for the payment of the claims of citizens of the United States against the Republic of Mexico. This bill provided that payment of awards rendered American claimants should be made within a stated period shortly after the rendition of such awards; thus the burden of awaiting the receipt of payment from Mexico would be shifted to the Government. No action, however, was taken on this bill by Congress, and it was reintroduced on December 18, 1931, by Senator SHEPPARD.

Through the conventions of 1923 there was afforded to two great nations of the North American Continent an opportunity to settle finally by judicial process many questions which had been casting a shadow over their friendly relations. Whether, with the arbitration incomplete, the Governments now prefer to leave unanswered the questions which have not already been met and decided, and to determine by some extrajudicial method the amount to be paid to the United States by reason of Mexico's liability to American claimants, rests with the future to disclose. International arbitration has attained a place of importance in the relationship of nations. This arbitration is one of more than 75 to which the United States has been a party, and it has entailed substantial financial outlay on the part of both Governments. If attention is directed to only the 166 decided claims, it may seem to have failed, in the light of some 5,700 docketed claims, to produce results commensurate with the time, effort, and money expended; but, as has been mentioned, aside from the decided claims, several hundred of the docketed claims in various

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the next amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as directed by the committee, I send to the desk an amendment providing for a tax upon furs and ask that it may be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 245, strike out lines 24 and 25, and lines 1, 2, and 3, on page 246, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(a) There is hereby imposed upon the dressing (on or after the 15th day after the date of the enactment of this act and before July 1, 1934) of raw furs a tax equivalent to 10 per cent of the fair market value of the dressed furs, to be paid by the owner thereof.

(b) Every person engaged in dressing furs shall make monthly reports under oath in duplicate to the collector for the district in which is located his principal place of business, or, if he has no principal place of business in the United States, then to the collector at Baltimore, Md. Such reports shall list all furs dressed by such person and the names and addresses of the owners of such furs, and shall contain such additional information, and shall be made at such times and in such manner as the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may by regulations prescribe.

(c) Subject to the provisions of section 601 (c), there is hereby imposed upon all dressed furs imported into the United States a tax at the rate of 10 per cent ad valorem.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, as I understood the reading of the amendment, it requires all people who dress or tan furs to report. There are a lot of individuals who do that kind of work. The Indians make quite a business of it on certain reservations. How is it going to affect those Indians and will they be required to report to the customs officers?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think they finish the furs in the sense that is understood by the general trade. They may finish their own furs for their own use. This tax applies to the finisher, and there are about 87 of them in the United States. It is impossible to impose the tax on the fur after it has been placed on an article of wearing apparel. What we do is to impose the tax upon the finishers of the furs, and there are, as I said, about 87 of them in the United States. The tax will not attach to such cases as those to which the Senator from North Dakota refers.

Mr. FRAZIER. Is it merely applicable to an organization that makes a business of finishing furs?

Mr. SMOOT. It is.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, does it really refer to imported furs or does it refer to otter skins and things like that in this country?

Mr. SMOOT. It is a tax upon the furs of this country and upon imported furs. They all have to be dressed. This is the only way we can get the tax. It is impossible to take it beyond this point. The Senator can see how impossible it would be to tax a piece of fur which might be placed around the sleeve of a coat or a little piece of fur around the collar of a coat. We can not follow those bits of fur into the manufacturers' places. This is the only way we can get the tax. The revenue from this source will amount to about $15,000,000.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is quite a little tax, but I do not think the poor Indians ought to be taxed.

Mr. SMOOT. They are not to be taxed. They are not finishers. We mean to tax the skins finished for the market.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Utah how much the proposed tax will bring in revenue?

Mr. SMOOT. We do not know, but as nearly as we can figure it, about $15,000,000.

Mr. BLAINE. It seems to me the amendment as drawn will apply the tax to the individual who dresses and tans his own furs.

Mr. SMOOT. But he is not a finisher.

Mr. BLAINE. He is to the extent in which he engages in the business. It may be only for himself or, as the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. FRAZIER] suggested, it may be done by the Indians for themselves and for trading purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not intended, and I am quite sure the Government of the United States would never think of imposing a tax upon such an individual.

Mr. BLAINE. It is not a question of what is intended; it is a question of what the language clearly means. Otherwise we are going to have bootlegging in furs. If the amendment means what it says, it applies to the individual finisher who finishes furs for himself or who engages in finishing furs for others to a very limited extent. Where are we going to draw the line? If we are going to exempt the individual it ought to be made clear that that is the intent.

Mr. SMOOT. Is the person engaged in dressing furs?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes; to a limited extent.

Mr. SMOOT. To what extent?

Mr. BLAINE. I do not know.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator refers to "the individual."

Mr. BLAINE. If a man does a certain thing he is engaged in doing it.

Mr. SMOOT. But that is not his main business.

Mr. BLAINE. The amendment does not say his main business or industry. It does not say one who is engaged mainly in this sort of thing.

Mr. SMOOT. Does he have a principal place of business?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes; he has a principal place of business.

Mr. SMOOT. Then if he has a principal place of business and makes it his business to dress furs, he can pay the tax.

Mr. BLAINE. Exactly. So it will apply to the Indians. The Indians from time immemorial have been traders in furs.

Mr. SMOOT. In raw furs mostly.

Mr. BLAINE. But they have developed now so they know how to cure and finish furs.

Mr. SMOOT. It is the dressed furs to which the tax will apply. The mere drying of them is not covered here at all.

Mr. BLAINE. I understand it includes finishing and tanning.

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment provides:

(b) Every person engaged in dressing furs shall make monthly reports under oath in duplicate to the collector for the district in which is located his principal place of business, or, if he has no principal place of business in the United States, then to the collector at Baltimore, Md. Such reports shall list all furs dressed by such person and the names and addresses of the owners of such furs and shall contain such additional information, and shall be made at such times and in such manner as the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may by regulations prescribe.

Mr. BLAINE. I want to invite the attention of the Senator to the fact that there are numerous individuals who know how to cure, dress, and tan furs, and do a very skillful job. The amendment now offered would apply to such individuals to the extent in which they are engaged in that occupation. I should like to ask the Senator why the House provision could not be administered?

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say that such a provision is impossible of administration. The fur can not be traced under the wording of the House provision, and it was so admitted by all the furriers in the United States.

Mr. BLAINE. Then, would not that be true respecting a general sales tax?

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. BLAINE. Would there not be exactly the same difficulty under the general sales tax which is to be proposed?

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. BLAINE. How would the general sales tax be traced in the case of furs and clothing, the chief value of which is fur?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no provision in regard to chief value being of fur in this amendment. If we went that far, it would be impossible to administer it.

Mr. WATSON. It could not be done.

Mr. BLAINE. I am anticipating the proposal that is going to be made of a general sales tax, and a general sales tax is going to include furs.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. BLAINE. How is a general sales tax going to be administered? It must be imposed along the lines of the provision regarding furs in the House bill; and if that provision can not be administered, how can the other be administered?

Mr. SMOOT. We are not framing this bill with a view to having a general sales tax.

Mr. BLAINE. I understand that; that is not now being done; but I also anticipate that we are going very shortly to face the question of the sales tax.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator will pardon me. If the House provision, or a provision along that line, could not be administered, how is a general sales tax on furs going to be administered?

Mr. SMOOT. We can discuss the question of the general sales tax on furs on whatever basis may be proposed, whether on retail sales or wholesale sales, when we reach it. That, however, has nothing whatever to do with the pending item. I do not know whether a sales tax is going to be adopted or not. What we are doing now is endeavoring to secure action on the bill as it is now framed.

Mr. BLAINE. Very well; but the Senator from Massachusetts is going to offer a sales tax amendment, excluding clothing of a certain value. If that can not be administered——

Mr. SMOOT. I did not say that.

Mr. BLAINE. I mean if it is impossible to administer the House fur provision, or a similar provision, how is it going to be possible to administer the proposal of the Senator from Massachusetts as to wearing apparel and clothing? The difficulties are exactly the same.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Utah has the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HAWES. The House bill provided a limitation on sales amounting to $10,000, did it not?

Mr. SMOOT. The House provision reads:

> There is hereby imposed upon the following articles, sold by the manufacturer, producer, or importer, a tax equivalent to 10 per cent of the price for which so sold: Articles made of fur on the hide or pelt or of which any such fur is the component material of chief value.

There was not a single solitary witness who came before the committee who did not say that that provision was absolutely impossible of administration.

Mr. HAWES. I should like to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that the committee's mind might have been directed to fancy furs, but the great fur crop of America is the rabbit skin. Over a million rabbits are killed in the State of Pennsylvania alone each year.

Mr. SMOOT. And many more than that, of course, in other States.

Mr. HAWES. I was referring merely to one State. The limitation was stricken out, then?

Mr. SMOOT. The whole provision was stricken out by the committee because of the fact that there were at least 10 witnesses who appeared before the committee who all agreed that it was impracticable.

Mr. WATSON. And the experts of the Treasury Department also appeared and agreed that the provision was not susceptible of administration.

Mr. BLAINE. Do the consumers of this country agree to it?

Mr. SMOOT. The consumers have not agreed to any tax.

Mr. BLAINE. Are not the consumers the people for whom we ought to legislate instead of a small group that may or may not agree to a thing?

Mr. SMOOT. Everybody in the United States had a perfect right to come before the committee and be heard.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course the consumers can not possibly be heard, and the Senator knows that.

Mr. WATSON. If they could, I will say to my friend the Senator from Wisconsin, we would never pass any tax bill.

Mr. BLAINE. The chief of police would not let them come here.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, Mr. President, do not let us go into that; let us get back to the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. Let me ask the Senator this question: Is not the language in the House provision identically the same as the language contained in scores of tariff acts? Is not that true?

Mr. SMOOT. Every item has to have its particular wording designed to enable the tax to be collected, and it can be collected, of course, usually without a question of a doubt. But as to the provision in the House bill there was not a single witness but who said it was impossible of administration.

Mr. BLAINE. May I call the Senator's attention to the tariff act respecting wool. The Senator will recall the provision was adopted, as I recall, that any article containing 15 per cent, or whatever the percentage was, of wool should bear a certain tax; and in other items the tariff act provides certain duties on articles of which wool, for instance, is the component material of chief value. Such provisions are contained in innumerable items, and the Treasury Department has no trouble in administering the tariff act, has it?

Mr. SMOOT. In the case of wool there are very few importers, but when it comes to furs there would be affected every woman in the United States who buys a coat or wears a piece of fur, no matter whether the cost was 10 cents or $10,000.

Mr. BLAINE. It would apply to manufacturers, not to individuals, and the department certainly knows who the manufacturers are.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no comparison between the situation as it relates to wool and furs. The wool upon which we impose a duty comes to the customhouse and the tax is applied only to those who import wool, and there are not very many of them engaged in that business.

Mr. BLAINE. That is true.

Mr. HAWES. The provision puts a tax upon rabbit skins.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; it puts a tax upon all skins.

Mr. KING. Upon those who dress the rabbit skins.

Mr. SMOOT. Upon those who dress them.

Mr. HAWES. Indirectly, that is upon the rabbit skins.

Mr. KING. No; it is upon the dresser of the rabbit skins.

Mr. SMOOT. There is nothing in this bill that we have considered more carefully than this question. We had before us the department experts; we had before us those who purchase the furs; and I want to say to the Senator that the dressers themselves say that the provision now suggested is the only one that can be successfully administered. There are only 87 of them, I think, in the United States.

Mr. BLAINE. That is, 87 whose chief business is dressing furs.

Mr. SMOOT. There is where the tax will be collected.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Treasury Department enforces the law, it is going to be enforced against the individual, the number of whom no one knows, but it is a very large number just the same; otherwise, we would have a situation grow up where individuals would be engaged in a sort of bootlegging trade in the fur business. That is what is bound to result, and the consumer is going to pay the price.

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment now offered provides that—

> Every person engaged in dressing furs shall make monthly reports under oath in duplicate to the collector for the district in which is located his principal place of business, or, if he has no principal place of business in the United States, then to the collector at Baltimore, Md.

Mr. BLAINE. Every individual has his principal place of business where he prepares the furs.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that every effort was made in framing this bill to hear the parties interested and the departments of the Government; hearings were held by the committee, and it was decided that this was the only way that the tax could be fairly collected. It can not be collected if it goes farther than the dresser of furs, because of the fact that it would cover perhaps 10 per cent of the clothing sales made in retail stores, there being many garments on which there is a little fur around the sleeve or a little fur around the collar.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator wants to defeat the proposed tax, what he has suggested is the way to do it.

Mr. BLAINE. Let me ask the Senator another question. Is not the tax levied under the House provision on the wholesale price a tax on the manufacturer?

Mr. SMOOT. It is on the manufacturer.

Mr. BLAINE. I just want to understand if the House provision does not apply to the wholesale price and to the manufacturer?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, yes; and more, too——

Mr. BLAINE. But not to the retailer.

Mr. SMOOT. The House provision uses the words "manufacturer, producer, or importer."

Mr. BLAINE. Yes; "manufacturer, producer, or importer," but not the retailer.

Mr. SMOOT. There are thousands of those who engage in the manufacture of coats and dresses all over the United States and sometimes they use just a little bit of fur and sometimes they make a coat that is worth thousands of dollars. The provision could not be administered in any other way than now proposed.

Mr. BLAINE. I did not want the suggestion to go unanswered that the House provision applied to the retailer at all.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not say that. The Senator asked the question and I said "no." I say that it applies to the "manufacturer, producer, or importer."

Mr. BLAINE. The House provision does not apply to all goods which have fur trimmings on them; it only applies to those the chief value of which is fur.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the trouble with it. Who is going to look at every article that is made that has a piece of fur upon it? It can not be done.

The House provision reads—I will quote it again—

> A tax equivalent to 10 per cent of the price for which so sold: Articles made of fur on the hide or pelt or of which any such fur is the component material of chief value.

It would have to be ascertained in the case of every article, whether its chief value is fur or not, and that could not be done.

Mr. BLAINE. But there are the manufacturers who will make their reports and who are not very numerous.

Mr. SMOOT. There are a great many of them.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes; there are a great many of them; but how many income-tax reports are there? There are three or four million people who file income-tax returns.

Mr. President, I desire to invite attention to a few facts respecting the proposed amendment. It is a direct sales tax; there is no question about that. It is a sales tax upon necessities of life. I am not speaking of the ermine opera gown; I am not speaking of the sealskin coat or the mink coat or other expensive furs; but I do desire to invite attention to the fact that there are many cheap furs in the United States which go into garments and clothing which are just as essential to comfort as is fuel and just as essential to life as is food.

I want to invite attention to the fact that over 60 per cent of the people of the United States live in a climate where the temperature hovers around zero or below for many months in the year. The people living in the regions where such temperatures prevail need warm garments; they need warm coats and jackets and caps and mittens, and those people constitute a very large number.

I first desire to direct attention to the fact that among the cheap furs that are used for the purposes to which I shall soon refer there are the cheap wolfskin; the Belgian hare or rabbit skin; the cheap fox furs; the cheap dogskin, which, I assume, will be classified as fur; there are certain cheap muskrat furs and raccoon furs and other cheap furs, all of which, or most of which, go into the manufacture of coats and jackets and caps and mittens worn by very numerous classes in this country; and I want to refer to those numerous classes.

The street-car motormen who are exposed to the inclement weather all over the northern part of the United States must have fur-lined or sheepskin-lined coats in order to withstand the blasts of the wind and the low temperature that prevails on many of the days throughout the winter months. I do not know how many in that employment require the cheaper coats and jackets in order to protect their health and give them comfort.

Then there are the men who are working on the railroads, the maintenance-of-way men, all exposed to the inclement weather. There are the freight-train brakemen, all of them exposed to the weather and all of them requiring hats and caps and mittens or gloves and coats and jackets made out of something more substantial than fabrics. In fact, they require a pelt. It may be a pelt lined with wool, or the lining may be of pelt from these cheaper furs.

Then there are the factory and mine workers who live some distance from the place of their employment. Whether they come out of the factory or out of the mine, with a 30 or 40 mile blast of chilling wind, with a temperature at zero or below, they require something more than cotton or any other clothing made out of fabric.

Then there are the men who work in the woods. They require the same character of clothing to protect them against the inclemency of the cold in the northern climate.

Then there are the farmers, all of them requiring coats and jackets and caps and mittens and gloves that are something more than fabric in order to give them comfort. They also wear clothing that is made out of or is lined with some pelt, whether it is that of wool or of fur.

Then there are the school children.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, this provision does not apply to wool at all.

Mr. BLAINE. I know it does not apply to wool.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what the Senator has been talking about.

Mr. BLAINE. That has nothing to do with it. Some of these garments are made out of wool. Perhaps the Senator would like to drive the fur-lined coats and jackets out of the market, so that all of these necessary garments should be made out of wool pelts; but the school children in the rural districts, who have a mile or a mile and a half to go to school, whether by foot or by transportation, require garments more protective than garments made out of fabric, so they wear coats or jackets and caps and mittens made out of pelts, either wool or fur.

Then there are in this country, as was shown the other day by the Senator from Michigan, over 1,500,000 truck drivers, most of them up in the northern part of the United States; and all of them, in order to give them comfort against the winds and the low temperatures of the northern part of the United States, must have clothing made out of something other than cotton or any other fabric, something other than rayon or silk. They must have substantial wearing apparel that will withstand the blasts of the winter winds and the low temperatures that prevail in the northern part of the United States.

Then there are other large groups of citizens of this country who are exposed to the inclemency of our colder climate; and they, in turn, wear coats and jackets and caps and mittens and gloves made out of something other than fabric.

The people to whom I have referred are the people least able to pay; and yet, under this proposal, every one of them who wears a garment to which I have made reference will be compelled to pay a sales tax of 10 per cent on the value of that garment.

I am perfectly willing, and I think we ought, to impose a tax upon the luxuries. I am perfectly willing to impose a tax upon the ermine opera coat, and the sealskin coat, and the otter coat, and the mink coat, which run into hundreds of dollars in value; but these other garments to which I refer are purchased at a price under $50 by the men and women who use them. If it is a coat or jacket made out of these cheaper furs, the price will run probably all the way from $5 to $50. The caps and mittens and gloves will cost under $5.

The people to whom I have referred are the people who are going to be burdened with a 10 per cent sales tax under this fur proposal. I insist that when we get into the discussion of the general sales tax we will find exactly the same difficulties to which the Senator from Utah has referred in administering those proposals.

It was my purpose to offer an amendment to the House provision relating to furs to impose a tax on the basis of value, and to exempt from that tax coats and jackets where the price for which sold is under $40—I say $40 because, as I understand and as the Senator has suggested, the price is the wholesale price—and exempting caps and gloves and mittens where the price for which sold is under $4, thereby exempting from this sales tax a large group of men who work upon the street cars, the freight trains, in the woods, in the factories and mines, who operate the trucks throughout the country, who work upon the farms, and the school children of the rural districts; all of those people who live in climates where the temperature during the winter months oftentimes hovers around zero or below, and where the winter wind drives with such a blast that nothing but a fur pelt or a woolen pelt will protect them from the inclemency of the northern climate.

I can not bring myself to the position of voting for a proposal that makes no exemption of the essential and necessary wearing apparel of the great mass of those least able to pay in this country.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I am impressed with the idea that what the Senator is saying is an argument in favor of the sales tax with the exemptions which are so generous for all the low-priced articles.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I have not examined your sales proposition. I am discussing this proposition as a sales tax of the most obnoxious character, without any exemptions whatever to those who are least able to pay; but I rather assume that the sales tax that is going to be proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] will not contain exemptions that are going to protect the people who to-day either have no income or have an income diminishing to the point where they are almost unable to maintain themselves and their families.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin further yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BLAINE. I do.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator speaks about "your sales tax." I have not any sales tax.

Mr. BLAINE. No; I did not mean to refer to the Senator's personal sales tax. I meant to refer to the Democratic sales tax that is to be proposed by the Democratic Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, I assume that any Democratic measure, no matter what it might be, would be a good measure. As a matter of fact, from what I know about the Walsh amendment, the Senator from Massachusetts purposes doing exactly what the Senator from Wisconsin has in mind—exempting all those things which are necessities of life and of low cost; and I understand that his proposal contains an exemption of everything the Senator is pleading for. In the same speech the Senator speaks about taxing sealskins and sables and the other high-priced furs, and I entirely approve of what he says; but if there were a general sales tax, such as the Senator appears to be arguing for, if he will permit me to say so, he would gain the exemptions that he seeks, and at the same time impose the tax where it properly belongs, upon the high-priced articles.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BLAINE. Just a moment. I am sure the Senator from New York is generous enough to permit me to state in my own words and in my own language my position on the sales tax, instead of having my position stated by the Senator from New York, who has inaccurately stated it and improperly drawn his conclusion.

Mr. COPELAND. Oh, certainly. I apologize to the Senator.

Mr. BLAINE. Knowing the Senator from New York, as I do, to be broad and generous in his views, he certainly will grant to me the privilege of stating my own position.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course. I was only drawing the conclusion from what I understood the Senator to say. If I am mistaken, I am sorry.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not ask the Senator to express any regrets or apologies. I was just asking that I be permitted to state my own position, rather than to have my position stated by the Senator from New York.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BLAINE. I do.

Mr. KING. Will not my able friend from Wisconsin modify the statement made a moment ago that the proposed sales tax to be offered by the Senator from Massachusetts is a Democratic sales tax?

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I probably ought to modify that. I had in mind the Democrat from Massachusetts, who is one of the outstanding and leading Democrats of the United States, and naturally would give the impression to the country that he gave to me—the suggestion that it was a Democratic proposal. I am very glad if the Senator is going to suggest that the Democratic Party as such does not stand for the sales tax.

Mr. KING. I think I may state that and affirm it. I am not, of course, authorized to speak for the Democratic Party, but I think the Senator ought to give some credit, if there is any credit for the sales tax, to the able senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], who in season and out of season—and I am not criticizing him—has been a very powerful protagonist for the sales tax.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for the suggestion, but I think I ought to be entirely fair, and say that the coalition proposal of the high priest of protection, the Senator from Pennsylvania, and the Democratic Senator from Massachusetts, will jointly, at least mentally, propose the sales tax, and it may be characterized as a coalition proposal by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], a Republican, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], a Democrat. On that proposition that Republican and that Democrat will stand upon the same platform, notwithstanding what platforms may or will be adopted by the two parties at Chicago in June.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator has made the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] the father and mother of the sales tax. He ought to include the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] as the grandfather of that idea, because he was the originator of it, I believe.

Mr. BLAINE. I did not want to run the parentage back to Adam.

Mr. President, I was not intending to enter upon a discussion of the sales tax. I was going to criticize the pending proposal, as I conceive it to be a sales tax of 10 per cent on essential and necessary clothing for a very large group of our people, especially people who work, and who are least able to pay.

I am opposed to a general sales tax; indeed, I am opposed to a sales tax in any form. I think it is an improper method of levying taxes. My own feeling is and has been that taxes should be levied according to the ability to pay, and not according to the girth of a man, or the size of a man, or his capacity to work, or his capacity to consume.

A sales tax is based upon those very propositions; first, on the capacity of a man to work. The harder he works the greater tax he pays. It depends upon the capacity of a man to produce. The more he produces the greater the tax he pays. It depends upon the size of the man, for the greater the size the greater will be the amount of material necessary for the garments he wears, therefore the greater the tax.

Mr. President, a sales tax is a tax upon consumption. It is a tax which will discourage an upturn in our affairs. There is now a lack of purchasing power among the people, and under a general sales tax that purchasing power would be reduced, according to the amount of the sales tax imposed, and it would be found that the depression would widen and deepen. If we adopt the sales tax in this country, we will be going in the very face of the depression, and will increase the depression and add to the agony through which the American people are passing.

My own opinion is, as I have said, and I repeat, that we should adopt an income surtax, whereby those who are best able to pay will discharge their just obligations toward the Government.

I am willing that he who receives a large income should be permitted to purchase all of the necessities of life for himself and family. And I will go farther and grant him the privilege of satisfying his tastes for the luxuries of life and the extravagances of life—let him have all those things—but the excess dollars are impressed with a social obligation, Those dollars could not be possessed without the protecting mantle of this Government.

Therefore such dollars should be commanded to respond to the duty and the obligation placed upon them by our social organization.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I am in great sympathy with most of what the Senator says; but when he talks about the income tax reaching all the dollars he has in mind, I think he is mistaken. I think it would fail to do that, because much of the income of the rich comes from tax-exempt securities or from dividends which are not taxed.

The sales tax, with exemptions to cover the very persons the Senator has in mind, would reach every man and woman in this country, and the richer they are and the more they spend the more they would contribute. I would not vote for a sales tax which would touch the necessities of life or which would touch the suit of clothes the laboring man wears, and while I have not seen the bill proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, if I am correctly advised by the press, he would exempt a suit of clothes which sells for $30 wholesale, which would be $40 or $45 retail, and he would exempt all the food necessities and all those things which are really necessities. So, in the last analysis, if I understand the bill at all, it would impose a burden upon the bloated, upon those of great wealth, and the revenue would come from the very persons whom the Senator very properly would seek to reach and the persons who ought to make use of their dollars, given to them in trust.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I have not seen the proposal of the Senator from Massachusetts; I have seen a purported outline of the proposal in the newspapers, and I do not care to discuss a proposal about which I know little and about which I have no information from an authoritative source.

The Senator from New York is mistaken when he suggests that we can not obtain the necessary funds from an income tax law. He suggests that revenue is not derived from tax-exempt securities and that those securities are so great in amount that the amount of the income-tax returns would be diminished. It is true that on account of the tax-exempt securities there would be some reduction in the income taxes, but it is disputed, and very vigorously disputed, that the amount of tax-exempt securities reduces the income-tax return appreciably.

Moreover, Mr. President, there is another factor in this connection. The tax-exempt securities are obligations of the Government of the United States, or obligations of the States, or obligations of the counties, cities, and other subdivisions of the States. Those are the obligations which are tax exempt, and I point out that because of the exemption of those securities the interest rates on the securities are much lower than if they were subject to taxation. Thus the taxpayers of the country are saved a very large tax burden which would be imposed upon them if those tax-exempt securities were taxable. The people are saved a portion of the tax burden by reason of those tax-exempt securities. They are saved that tax burden annually by reason of the reduction in the interest rates which tax-exempt securities bear as compared with securities which are not tax exempt.

There are some very sound utility and industrial bonds in this country which bear an interest rate of 6 or 7 and even as high as 7½ per cent, while Government bonds and municipal bonds sell at either par or at a premium, bearing a much lower interest rate, and the interest rates are always paid by the taxpayer. Therefore the greater the reduction in the interest rate, the greater is the reduction in the amount of the taxes. When we take that factor into consideration, then the force of the claim that tax-exempt securities destroy income is greatly minimized.

Mr. President, in the consideration of this proposition I must vote against the committee amendment. I will propose the amendment which I have suggested to the House provision if the committee amendment shall be rejected, thus exempting to this large number of men who are subjected to the inclemency of the weather in the winter months in the northern part of the United States from the payment of the taxes upon the ordinary and essential garments they must wear—the coats, the vests, and the jackets and the caps, the gloves and the mittens, which are made out of the cheaper furs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. COPELAND. Do I understand that the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin was carried?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin offered no amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I announced that if the committee amendment were defeated I would offer an amendment to the House provision exempting from the tax the coats and jackets the price for which sold is under $40 and the caps, gloves, and mittens where the price for which sold is under $4, taking into consideration the fact that those values refer to the wholesale price.

Mr. COPELAND. I wanted to vote for the Senator's amendment, but I will now have no opportunity to do so.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I regret the Senator did not support my position in opposing the committee amendment. Had the committee amendment been defeated, the Senator from New York would have had an opportunity to vote for the amendment I would have offered.

Mr. COPELAND. I should have been very glad to have an opportunity to do that. The Senator did not call for the yeas and nays, and he did not give us an opportunity to help him in his battle. I should have been glad to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will report the next amendment.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Title VI—Estate tax amendments," on page 291, line 5, after the word "act," to insert "(except in cases where a petition for redetermination of a deficiency has been filed with the Board of Tax Appeals within the time prescribed in sec. 308)," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 802. 80 PER CENT CREDIT

(a) Section 301 (b) of the Revenue Act of 1926 is amended to read as follows:

"(c) The tax imposed by subdivision (a) of this section shall be credited with the amount of any estate, inheritance, legacy, or succession taxes actually paid to any State or Territory or the District of Columbia, in respect of any property included in the gross estate (not including any such taxes paid with respect to the estate of a person other than the decedent). The credit allowed by this subdivision shall not exceed 80 per cent of the tax imposed by subdivision (a) (after deducting from such tax the credits provided by subdivision (b)), and shall include only such taxes as were actually paid and credit therefor claimed within four years after the filing of the return required by section 304, except that—

"(1) If a petition for redetermination of a deficiency has been filed with the Board of Tax Appeals within the time prescribed in section 308, then within such 4-year period or before the expiration of 60 days after the decision of the board becomes final.

"(2) If, under subdivision (b) of section 305 of subdivision (1) of section 308, an extension of time has been granted for payment of the tax shown on the return, or of a deficiency, then within such 4-year period or before the date of the expiration of the period of the extension.

"Refund based on the credit may (despite the provisions of sec. 319) be made if claim therefor is filed within the period above provided. Any such refund shall be made without interest, except that where the overpayment was made prior to the enactment of the revenue act of 1932, then interest shall be allowed and paid on the amount refunded at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from the date of the overpayment to the date of such enactment."

(b) If any return required by section 304 of the revenue act of 1926 was filed more than three years before the enactment of this act (except in cases where a petition for redetermination of a deficiency has been filed with the Board of Tax Appeals within the time prescribed in sec. 308), the credit for estate, inheritance, legacy, or succession taxes shall be determined as if this section had not been enacted.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 295, line 12, after the word "worth," to insert:

There shall also be deducted losses incurred during the settlement of estates arising from fires, storms, shipwrecks, or other casualties, or from theft, when such losses are not compensated for by insurance or otherwise, and if at the time of the filing of the return such losses have not been claimed as a deduction for income-tax purposes in an income-tax return.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 805. DEDUCTIONS

Section 303 (a) (1) of the revenue act of 1926, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(1) Such amounts—

"(A) for funeral expenses,

"(B) for administration expenses,

"(C) for claims against the estate,

"(D) for unpaid mortgages upon, or any indebtedness in respect to, property where the value of decedent's interest therein, undiminished by such mortgage or indebtedness, is included in the value of the gross estate, and

"(E) reasonably required and actually expended for the support during the settlement of the estate of those dependent upon the decedent, as are allowed by the laws of the jurisdiction, whether within or without the United States, under which the estate is being administered, but not including any income taxes upon income received after the death of the decedent, or property taxes not accrued before his death, or any estate, succession, legacy, or inheritance taxes. The deduction herein allowed in the case of claims against the estate, unpaid mortgages, or any indebtedness shall, when founded upon a promise or agreement, be limited to the extent that they were contracted bona fide and for an adequate and full consideration in money or money's worth. There shall also be deducted losses incurred during the settlement of estates arising from fires, storms, shipwrecks, or other casualties, or from theft, when such losses are not compensated for by insurance or otherwise, and if at the time of the filing of the return such losses have not been claimed as a deduction for income-tax purposes in an income-tax return."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I was greatly interested in the discussion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] on the matter of the tax on furs. I desired to ask him a question. First, I wanted to consult with the Biological Survey to find out just what is the classification of furs sold in America. I find that from 50,000,000 to 100,000,000 rabbit skins are sold each year in the United States, and that some 600,000 hunters take out licenses for the purpose of hunting the rabbits. I think the Senator from Wisconsin has clearly demonstrated that, beginning at the very top of all commodities and descending down to the lowly humble rabbit, nothing escapes taxation under this bill. As the Senator from New York has said, in the proposal soon to be made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], these things are all exempted—drugs, medicine, food, clothing—but the present tax bill proposed by the committee does not even eliminate the humble rabbit.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I desire to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the tax on furs was adopted. I am willing to vote upon that motion at this time, but I suggest first the absence of a quorum and then I shall ask for the yeas and nays. However, it has just been suggested that perhaps the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] will grant a request for reconsideration. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the committee amendment with reference to furs was adopted may be reconsidered.

Mr. SMOOT. For what object?

Mr. BLAINE. For the purpose of obtaining a record vote upon the matter, I am frank to say.

Mr. SMOOT. Without any further discussion?

Mr. BLAINE. Senators may want to discuss it. I do not include that in my unanimous-consent request.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will do that I shall be very glad to grant his request.

Mr. BLAINE. I think that would be unfair. I think we can hasten the situation by submitting the motion to reconsider unless the Senator grants my request.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not any objection to a reconsideration, but had we not better have a limit on debate?

Mr. BLAINE. So far as I am concerned——

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Wisconsin now has spoken quite a while on it.

Mr. BLAINE. I see no object in the Senator suggesting to me that I have spoken quite a while. I have occupied scarcely any time during these two weeks and the suggestion carries an implication of criticism. I am sure the Senator ought to grant the privilege to a Senator to discuss a matter when that Senator so chooses. I assume the responsibility for whatever discussion I may indulge in here in this Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. Nobody doubts that at all. I am simply referring to the fact and trying to arrive at an agreement that will not take too much time. I have no objection to a reconsideration of the vote on the amendment if the Senator wants it reconsidered.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I was very deeply impressed by the criticism made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE]. It is a matter of very great consequence to the people of my State, a very great majority of whom are obliged to purchase fur clothing for winter wear. I was wondering whether the real purpose could not be accomplished by putting some sort of limitation on the tax.

Mr. SMOOT. We have discussed that and it makes it impossible of administration. The furs come from every nook and corner of the country.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It would not be difficult at all to put a money limit, say anything over $100.

Mr. SMOOT. Then we would not get any tax.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is exactly the point. We are getting the tax out of the cheap furs which the general body of the people in the colder sections of the country are obliged to provide for themselves.

Mr. SMOOT. It only applies the tax upon the dresser of the fur. There are only 87 of them in the United States. There is no need of trying to go beyond that, because we could not reach every retail store, particularly in the West, or all over the United States for that matter. We could not put it upon the fur content of an article, because some of them have only a little piece of fur around the sleeve or collar.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But the provision is one that is quite common in tariff legislation at least. I do not quite understand how the contention can be sustained that the tax is only on the dresser of the fur.

Mr. SMOOT. Here is the way it reads:

There is hereby imposed upon the dressing (on or after the fifteenth day after the date of the enactment of this act, and before July 1, 1934) of raw furs, a tax equivalent to 10 per cent of the fair market value of the dressed furs, to be paid by the owner thereof.

We spent more time on this provision, probably, than on any other item in the bill. We tried to work out some plan so that the tax could be finally collected. The provision originally submitted was taken out and the Senate instructed us to bring back another provision, and it is here. It has been finally decided that the tax should be imposed upon the market value of the dressed fur.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That really is quite an improvement on the House provision.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I appreciate the difficulties of the chairman of the committee. May I point out to him that the proposed tax is a tax upon a necessity of life? It is a tax upon clothing. If the Senator has in mind the higher-priced furs——

Mr. SMOOT. No; the Senator has not.

Mr. TYDINGS. If the Senator has in mind the higher-priced furs, that is one thing; but there are a million truck drivers who use rabbit skins in the winter time, and it seems to me it would be outrageous to take the little bit of warmth which may be obtained from the cheaper skins and impose a tax upon it.

Mr. SMOOT. The committee did exactly what the Senate ordered it to do.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am not finding fault with the Senator at all, but I am pointing out to him that this is really a tax upon a necessity of life. If we were to adopt the sales tax, in my judgment, things of this kind would be eliminated. I am opposed to putting a tax on clothing.

Mr. SMOOT. All the Senate has to do is to turn the committee down. We were instructed to bring in the amendment. It will raise $15,000,000 of revenue. If the Senate wants to cut that out, let it vote against the amendment. I have no objection to a reconsideration and a vote now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin for a reconsideration of the vote whereby the committee amendment was agreed to? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered. The question is now on the committee amendment relating to furs.

Mr. SMOOT. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Cutting	Johnson	Schall
Bailey	Dale	Jones	Sheppard
Bankhead	Davis	Kean	Shortridge
Barbour	Dickinson	Kendrick	Smith

Connally	Hawes	Patterson	Walsh, Mont.
Coolidge	Hayden	Pittman	Watson
Copeland	Hebert	Reed	White
Costigan	Howell	Robinson, Ark.
Couzens	Hull	Robinson, Ind.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I am going to occupy only a few moments to inform the Senate of the exact question which is before the body, and I will ask first that the clerk state the committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah in the nature of a substitute for the committee amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. As a substitute for the committee amendment beginning in line 23, on page 245, it is proposed to insert in lieu of the matter proposed to be stricken out by the committee amendment the following:

(a) There is hereby imposed upon the dressing (on or after the 15th day after the date of the enactment of this act and before July 1, 1934) of raw furs, a tax equivalent to 10 per cent of the fair market value of the dressed furs, to be paid by the owner thereof.

(b) Every person engaged in dressing furs shall make monthly reports under oath in duplicate to the collector for the district in which is located his principal place of business, or if he has no principal place of business in the United States then to the collector at Baltimore, Md. Such reports shall list all furs dressed by such person, and the names and addresses of the owners of such furs and shall contain such additional information, and shall be made at such times and in such manner as the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may by regulations prescribe.

(c) Subject to the provisions of section 601 (c), there is hereby imposed upon all dressed furs imported into the United States a tax at the rate of 10 per cent ad valorem.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, as will be observed from a reading of the proposed substitute amendment offered by the committee, a 10 per cent tax is to be levied upon all dressed furs. Among those furs, of course, are included certain cheap furs that go into cheap clothing, namely, wolf, Belgian hare, hare, or rabbit, as it is popularly called, cheap fox skins, dog pelts and skins, the cheaper muskrat furs, and the cheaper raccoon furs, and other cheap furs. Such furs all go into the cheaper coats and jackets and the cheaper caps, gloves, and mittens.

This is the first proposal to indorse in principle the sales tax on a necessity of life on which the Senate has been called to act; and I want to point out the class of people who wear cheap clothing made of the cheaper furs. I do not know what percentage of such clothing is made of fur and what percentage is made of wool pelts. I want to make my explanation as brief as is possible and to call attention to the fact that a great majority of our people live in the northern part of the United States, where the thermometer ranges around zero and below for many days during the winter period, where the winds blow a terrific blast, and where it is essential, in order to protect those who are subjected to outside exposure in the inclemency of the weather, to have a garment that can not be penetrated by the wind. Skins and hides are the only materials out of which such garments can be made and at the same time give comfort to the wearer.

Motormen upon the street cars—I do not know how many of them there are—but there are many who are always subjected to the extreme weather conditions. Then we have the men known as the maintenance-of-way men on the railroads and the brakemen on the freight trains on the railroads. All of them wear clothing of the character to which I have referred.

We have the factory and mine workers, who must walk or drive a considerable distance to their places of employment. When they leave their warm homes or the heated factory or the warm mine it is necessary for them to have protective clothing, clothing that will protect them not only against the frigidity of the temperature but also against the wind.

Then we have the woodsmen, who must work in the forests and in the lumber mills. All the workmen engaged in the wood industry who are employed in outside work must have the protection of such clothing.

Then we have the farmers, a large class, and they must have this type of clothing.

Then we have the boys and girls who go to school in our rural districts. They generally wear this type of clothing. This type of clothing is necessary for that large group of people. Cotton or woolen clothing is not sufficient.

Then we have other large groups; we have the truck drivers, and, as the Senator from Michigan stated the other day, there are over 1,500,000 truck drivers in this country, a large number of whom live in the cold territory to which I have referred.

Then we also have many other citizens who need this type of clothing.

Here it is proposed to subject those citizens to a sales tax upon essential wearing apparel, which is just as necessary for the preservation of their comfort, their health, and their existence as is fuel.

There ought to be some method by which we can tax the ermine opera coat, the sealskin coat, the mink coat, the otter coat, and all the higher grades of fur garments enjoyed by the wealthy people of this country. I am perfectly willing to vote for, and I think there should be provided a tax upon, garments of that kind, which may be regarded as luxuries; but I think it is a mistake now this morning, near the close of the consideration of this tax bill, to indorse in principle the sales tax and apply it to the essential garments to which I have referred.

I have therefore suggested that the committee amendment should be rejected, and if the committee amendment shall be defeated I will offer an amendment to the House text providing as follows:

except the tax shall not apply to coats and jackets where the price for which sold is under $40, or to caps, gloves, and mittens where the price for which sold is under $4.

Those prices, of course, refer to the wholesale prices.

Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

Mr. BLAINE. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I invite the attention of the Senator to the fact that, in order to secure what he desires, his amendment ought to be voted on before the committee amendment is voted on, because the committee amendment is to strike out, and if there should be a negative vote to strike out after his amendment was adopted, the text would stand as he wants it. I make that suggestion as to the parliamentary situation.

Mr. BLAINE. If the committee amendment shall be defeated, then my proposed amendment would be in order.

Mr. FESS. It should be offered first.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose the committee amendment should be agreed to, then the Senator's amendment would be out of order. Why does not the Senator offer his proviso as an amendment to the committee amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. That can not be done because of the way it is worded.

Mr. NORRIS. The House text is subject to amendment, and I think the Senator from Wisconsin should offer his amendment to the House text; and if it is agreed to, then we would have the House text with his proviso attached to it, as against the committee amendment, and it would be a fair vote. Otherwise we do not know in advance what is going to happen. We would not like to vote against the committee amendment, and not have anything on the subject.

Mr. FESS. Suppose the committee amendment shall be rejected?

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose the committee amendment is not rejected, the Senator does not want to take a chance in advance; he does not know what is going to happen. If he waits, and the committee amendment is not rejected, then it is all over.

Mr. BLAINE. I appreciate the suggestion made by the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Nebraska, and now offer an amendment to perfect the House text by inserting, on page 246, at the end of line 3, after the word "value," the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 246, line 3, after the word "value," it is proposed to strike out the period, insert a comma and the following:

except the tax shall not apply to coats and jackets where the price for which sold is under $40, or to caps, gloves, or mittens where the price for which sold is under $4.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BINGHAM. The question now is, as I understand, on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, which is in opposition to the committee amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin proposes to perfect the House text, and the committee amendment proposes to strike out the House text and insert a new provision.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, a vote "nay" means to strike out the committee amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. No.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A vote "nay" would be against the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin proposing to perfect the House text before the vote is taken on the committee amendment. The Secretary will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], who is detained from the Senate on account of illness. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am paired with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. JONES. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BYRNES. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mrs. CARAWAY. On this question I have a pair with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG];

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY]; and

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] are detained on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 49, as follows:

YEAS—26

So Mr. BLAINE's amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] in behalf of the committee.

The amendment, in the nature of a substitute, was agreed to.

The amendment of the committee, as amended, was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next amendment.

The next amendment was, on page 303, after line 9, to strike out:

SEC. 811. REVALUATION OF DEPRECIATED ESTATES—RETROACTIVE

Title III of the revenue act of 1926 is amended by adding at the end thereof a new section to read as follows:

"SEC. 326. (a) In the case of the estate of a decedent who died on or after September 1, 1928, and prior to January 1, 1932, and at the election of the executor, the value of the gross estate and of the net estate shall be computed based upon values as of a date 18 months after the decedent's death (hereinafter referred to as 'subsequent value'), and the tax to be paid under this title shall bear the same ratio to a tax computed without reference to this section as the subsequent value of the net estate bears to the value of the net estate computed as of the date of the decedent's death, but in no case shall the tax be less than 60 per cent of the tax computed without reference to this section. Such election shall be exercised by the filing of a statement under oath which shall set forth all the necessary information and shall be filed not later than one year after the date of the enactment of the revenue act of 1932. Any amount of tax refundable by reason of this section shall be refunded where such statement is filed within the prescribed time, but the amount refunded shall be without interest. The credit allowed by section 301 for estate, inheritance, legacy, or succession taxes actually paid to any State or Territory or the District of Columbia shall not exceed 80 per cent of the tax as computed under this section.

"(b) In the case of any property (the value of which is required, under sec. 302, to be included in the value of the gross estate) which has been distributed or sold or otherwise disposed of after the death of the decedent and prior to the expiration of 18 months therefrom, then the subsequent value of such property shall be its value upon the date of such distribution, sale, or other disposition (in lieu of its value 18 months after the date of death); and in the case of property (such as leaseholds, patents, remainders, and other interests terminating upon the expiration of a period of time), the value of which is necessarily affected merely by the lapse of time or by the happening or nonhappening of a contingency, then the subsequent value of such property shall be determined without any allowance for change of value due merely to lapse of time or to the happening or nonhappening of the contingency.

"(c) In any case in which the estate tax to be paid in respect of the estate is computed under this section, then for income-tax purposes the basis for determining the gain or loss from the sale or other disposition of personal property acquired by specific bequest, or of real property acquired by general or specific devise or by intestacy, and the basis for determining loss from the sale or other disposition of property acquired by the decedent's estate from the decedent shall be the value at which such property is included in determining the subsequent value of the gross estate."

And to insert:

SEC. 811. FUTURE INTERESTS—EXTENSION OF TIME FOR PAYMENT OF TAX

(a) Section 305 of the revenue act of 1926 is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subdivision to read as follows:

"(e) Where there is included in the value of the gross estate the value of a reversionary or remainder interest in property, the payment of the part of the tax imposed by this title attributable to such interest may, at the election of the executor, be postponed until six months after the termination of the precedent interest or interests in the property, and the amount the payment of which is so postponed shall then be payable, together with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from 18 months after the date of the decedent's death until such amount is paid. The postponement of payment of such amount shall be under such regulations as the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary may prescribe, and shall be upon condition that the executor, or any other person liable for the tax, shall furnish a bond in such an amount, and with such sureties, as the commissioner deems necessary, conditioned upon the payment within six months after the termination of such precedent interest or interests of the amount the payment of which is so postponed, together with interest thereon, as above provided. Such part of any estate, inheritance, legacy, or succession taxes allowable as a credit against the tax imposed by this title as is attributable to such reversionary or remainder interest may be allowed as a credit against the tax attributable to such interest, subject to the percentage limitation contained in section 301 (c), if such part is paid, and credit therefor claimed, at any time prior to the expiration of 60 days after the termination of the precedent interest or interests in the property."

(b) The amendment to section 305 of the revenue act of 1926 made by subsection (a) of this section, shall be applicable only in the case of the estates of decedents dying after the enactment of this act.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] or the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED].

I assume that the committee had much trouble over this item.

Mr. REED. About striking out section 811 of the House bill?

Mr. COPELAND. Yes.

Mr. REED. No, Mr. President; we did not have much trouble about it. As soon as it became clear that the adoption of this section would take many millions of dollars from the separate Commonwealths of the Union, we saw that what the House provision proposed was that we should be generous to these people who are in difficulty, but that we should be generous at the expense of the separate States, and not at the expense of the Federal Treasury.

When we realized that single States like New York or Pennsylvania would lose anywhere from twenty up to forty or fifty million dollars, either in abatement of expected revenue or in refunds of past revenue, we saw instantly that we could not do it. We could not agree with the House, in fairness to the separate States; and that is why we agreed, without a single voice in dissent, to cut out the House provision in their section 811.

The Senator understands how that loss would fall upon the States, because, when we remit a part of the Federal estate tax, 80 per cent of that burden falls upon the Commonwealth to whom credit has been given.

Mr. COPELAND. I realize that what the Senator says is true.

This morning I received a letter from the director of the budget of New York State, Mark Graves, who is in charge of our taxation; and in one paragraph of this letter he speaks about having given the matter a lot of thought since he was here, when he made two suggestions to the committee. His thought now is that the statute should carry a provision to the effect that if the representatives of an estate desire a revaluation, such revaluation will be made, and the tax previously assessed reduced or abated to a figure which would be the equivalent of a tax at the rates contained in the new bill on an estate having the new valuation.

Mr. REED. Yes; I have heard that suggestion. His proposal, in a nutshell, is that where the testator died during the period of high prices the estate should now be revalued at the prices prevailing for those securities on the date of the approval of this act, and that the tax should then be imposed at the new rate of estate tax fixed by the pending bill.

That, I am afraid, would result in a heavier burden upon the separate States than would the proposal made by the House. It was brought to me by a number of gentlemen the other day, and I considered it carefully; and I think I can show quickly just how it would work.

Let us suppose that a testator died in July, 1929, and his estate consisted of Steel Co. stock, we will say, then selling for over $200 a share. Under the House provision that might be revalued 18 months after the date of death, or in July, 1931. In July, 1931, although I am no authority on quotations, my recollection is that Steel stock was selling for 70 or 80, or thereabouts.

Under the new suggestion of Mr. Graves, that Steel stock would be revalued at its present price of about $27 a share, and then the tax would be levied at the rates fixed by the new bill. We would have cut down the assessed value of the estate by nearly 90 per cent, and that would not begin to be compensated for by a doubling of the inheritance or estate tax.

Furthermore, something which I do not think occurred to Mr. Graves would enter into the picture, because of that doubled Federal tax which would be imposed under the new bill. States do not get 80 per cent of the total, but they get only 80 per cent of the old tax, and all of the new increase under this bill would go to the Federal Treasury. So that we would really be reducing the income of the Commonwealths from estates by about 90 per cent, which would simply wreck the treasuries of the Commonwealths. I use that word "Commonwealth" because "estate" and "State" sound so much alike. That would really wreck the treasuries of those of our Commonwealths which derive a large part of their income from those sources, such as the State of New York, and the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, this matter is so complicated and controversial that, in the event we adopt the Senate committee amendment, the whole matter will be in conference——

Mr. REED. Yes; that is true.

Mr. COPELAND. And by that time we hope an opportunity to work out perhaps a better provision than either of these may be afforded.

Mr. REED. I hope so. The new section, section 811, which is put in by the Finance Committee, has nothing to do, really, with depreciated estates. I will explain that in a moment.

We could not find any way to give relief to these estates which have shrunken so greatly that would not take that relief out of the treasuries of the several Commonwealths. Short of making a direct appropriation of Federal money to these individuals who have suffered from the decline, we could not think of any way of handling it; and of course that is out of the question.

Mr. COPELAND. I ask that this short letter from Director Graves be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT, DIVISION OF THE BUDGET,
Albany, May 26, 1932.

Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR COPELAND: Some few days ago, at the request of Governor Lehman, I sent you a copy of a memorandum which I had prepared relative to a revaluation provision contained in the House bill, authorizing the revaluation of estates for purposes of the Federal estate tax.

Since then I have given more mature thought to the subject, and on my visit to Washington last week discussed the matter with various people. I am now convinced that the second proposal contained in my memo is the only one that should be considered. It is the one which I can conscientiously advise New York to adopt if the Congress decides to include such a provision in the new bill.

Put simply, my second suggestion was that the statute carry a provision to the effect that if the representatives of an estate desired a revaluation, such revaluation would be made and the tax previously assessed reduced or abated to a figure which would be the equivalent of a tax at the rates contained in the new bill on an estate having the new valuation. Moreover, I said that in revaluing an estate there should be included in the case of assets distributed, sold, or otherwise disposed of, their value at the time of distribution, sale, or other disposition; except as to such assets, I said that I favored valuing the remaining assets as of the date of the taking effect of the new statute.

Such a revaluation provision, if included in the new revenue bill, will have the following effect:

1. Tax the estates of decedents dying in the past three years on a parity with those dying after the passage of the new act. The new bill graduates estate-tax rates from 1 per cent to 45 per cent. The existing statute graduates them from 1 per cent to 20 per cent. If the House provision were adopted it would have the effect of taxing the estates of those dying in the past two years less than those dying after the passage of the new act.

2. The House provision was not well designed to grant relief in proportion to need. This is so because while it provided for the revaluation of an estate, it required the payment of that fractional part of the tax originally assessed which the new valuation bore to the old one. That would have been fair, except for the presence of graduated rates. One almost has to see this worked out mathematically in order to appreciate it; nevertheless, it is true. My proposal will give the most relief to the estates which have shrunk the most. It will graduate the relief according to actual need therefor. Roughly speaking, it will deny relief to any estate which has not shrunk more than 50 per cent.

While I am quite convinced that the unusual and extraordinary shrinkage in estates in the past three years (1929, 1930, and 1931) requires recognition and action on the part of the Government, I am not writing you for the purpose of urging that. I am simply trying to keep you informed as to what I consider the fairest, best, and most logical form of relief to be given if the Congress decides to include such a provision in the revenue bill.

Very sincerely yours,

MARK GRAVES, Director.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am sure that when the conference committee meets it will, if possible, work out some plan which will be fair and just.

I know that in my State, as the Senator from Pennsylvania knows is the fact in his, there are many estates which are now in great distress because of the decline in values, and it is a very serious matter with them.

On the other hand, as the Senator has pointed out, it is a matter of concern in my State and his that there should be reserved to the State its just proportion of the estate tax which is now levied.

I will say no more than to express the hope that in the conference the matter may be given such further consideration as the facts justify.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. KING. Is it not a fact that not a single Commonwealth, to use the Senator's terminology, asked, directly or indirectly, of the Finance Committee for any change; that is, did they not indicate that they were willing to have a revaluation which would result in losses to them?

Mr. REED. Quite so. The only State official who has indicated a desire to see some kind of relief given is Mr. Graves, the representative of the State of New York.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I wish to say to the Senator from New York that I am not willing that this matter be worked out in conference. I think it is up to the Senate to express its viewpoint, and if the Senate disagrees with the thought of the Senate Finance Committee that no language can be found to aid those the Senator is endeavoring to aid, then the Senate ought to express itself in general terms, and send the bill back to the Finance Committee to redraft the language, so that the Senate itself may pass upon the question.

I think it is unfair to place the burden of this great problem—and it is a problem—upon the conferees of the two Houses, without any expression from this body as to what its views are on the subject.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, of course all we can do is to give the Senate the rather matured judgment of the Finance Committee. I think all of us feel sympathy for such estates as the Donnelly estate, of which I spoke, which, I am told, consisted mostly of Montgomery Ward stock. It is said the Federal estate tax upon that estate amounts to more than the present value of all the securities in the estate, and, of course, we sympathize in that situation. On the other hand, we can not overlook the fact that on the day the executors were qualified they had the power to sell that stock, and it is not exactly fair for them to carry the stock, accepting the benefit of all the increase if it went up and charging the Government with all the loss if it went down. They are in terribly hard luck; but so are many other Americans.

Mr. COUZENS. I think the Donnelly case has been overstated—I am not charging that to the Senator from Pennsylvania, of course—because there was sent out a letter by a Washington attorney, as I remember, drawing attention to that particular case and asking that there be congressional relief. I have forgotten who the attorney was, but, in any event, he did not state all the facts.

Mr. REED. Then let us leave out the name "Donnelly" and just say any estate in which the testator had a lot of common stock and died during the boom time in 1929.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I would not interrupt the Senator if I did not feel that our conferees, when they go to conference on this bill, ought to have an expression of the Members of the Senate on this difficult question, so that it can not be said to them, when they meet in conference, that it was just a matter of form and that the Senate did not express itself.

I believe this is an instance where the Finance Committee did the only thing it could do. I sympathize just as deeply as any man can with some of these estates which are in an unfortunate condition. But, as a matter of fact, if we should agree to the House provision, indirectly we would be taking away from the States by that action money which, under the law in effect at the time the owner of an estate died, would have gone to the several States. It would be almost as if, after the money had been collected and was on its way to the State, we should stop it and turn it back to the estate.

It is not so hard in most cases as would appear on the face of things. Take the illustration the Senator cited. At the time of the death of the man who owned the stock in Montgomery Ward, or at the time the executors were qualified, they could have sold all the stock, perhaps without any loss whatever. But they did not do that. They kept the stock for a year or so. Had those stocks gone up, the Government of the United States would not have gotten any more tax.

Mr. REED. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. In the meantime, however, in many of these cases the value of the stocks has gone down. The executors have held them at their own risk and in most cases, I presume, at their own will. They might have sold them and have been saved the loss.

I want to ask the Senator a question. I do not know whether he has any information on the subject or not, and I want to preface my question by saying that I do not want to be understood as criticizing the Committee on Ways and Means of the House in what I shall say. I am inclined to think they were deceived.

Mr. REED. I think they were given only half of the picture.

Mr. NORRIS. I have been told that the language in the bill as it passed the House which the Senate committee has stricken out was drawn by attorneys who are engaged in private practice, and that they induced the House committee to put that language in. It is easy to see that if the House language remains in the bill, if what I have said be accurate, the men who drew the language will probably make a great deal of money out of it through the clients who will come to them on account of that language in the measure.

Mr. REED. I do not know about that. Anyway, any lawyer could have written the section. I do not know who the author was.

Mr. NORRIS. I thought perhaps the Senator knew.

Mr. REED. No; I do not know.

Mr. NORRIS. It may be that I am mistaken.

Mr. REED. It may very well be that the Senator is correct. I do not know anything to the contrary of what he has said.

Mr. NORRIS. At any rate, it seems to me that while there will be some hardship on some people, in a great many cases brought about by their own action, nevertheless I sympathize with them, whether the hardship is the result of their own action or not. It looks to me as if there is absolutely no way for us to remedy the situation, and that the Committee on Finance has done the only thing it could possibly do, and the only possible thing that could be done to remedy it, it seems to me, would be an appropriation from the Treasury of the United States later to pay these people, because 80 per cent of this money we would be taking away from the States. As I understand it, some of the States, on the strength of the expectation of this money coming into their treasuries, knowing it was on its way, knowing of the amount of money they would receive from some of the large estates, have entered into obligations which they would be unable to meet unless we stand by the committee in this case.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to me?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. KING. Just to illustrate the difficulties which would result, and the uncertain field into which we would be plunged, one gentleman came to see me, representing an estate which consisted largely of a very costly building, the insurance upon which was only 15 or 20 per cent of its value. It was valued, at the time of the decease of the owner, at a million dollars or more. It was burned down, and after it was burned, with only a small amount of insurance, and after prices had gone down, the executor insisted that we should pass some law that would protect the estate and permit it to be revalued, because he had failed to take out enough insurance; and now the same property, if it had not been burned, would be worth only 15 or 20 per cent of what it was worth at the time of the valuation.

I had another case brought to my attention where a man represented an estate, the decedent having been a large sheep and cattle man. He had bought sheep and cattle at high prices, and when he died the value of the estate was very high, commensurate only, however, with the prices at that time. Now sheep and cattle are down in price, sheep down to a dollar or two a head and cattle correspondingly low in price. The executor felt that there ought to be a revaluation of the estate and the estate relieved of the tax which was levied at the time of the appraisement.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the problem is a very difficult one, and the hardship is not all on one side. There is no doubt about that.

I am thinking of one very rich man out in Ohio who was conspicuous throughout his life for his charity, and who in his will first made a lot of very large specific bequests in money to the charities in which his interest was centered.

His estate was worth many millions of dollars at the time he died. The charitable bequests were not valid, because he had made them within a year of his death, and I believe that under the Ohio law one must live for a year after the date of the will in order to make such bequests valid. Nevertheless, his family—more credit to them—want to respect his wishes and pay those legacies, even if they are not legally valid. The estate has so shrunk that after paying the estate tax and paying part of those legacies there will not be one red cent left for the relatives.

The committee have not been unsympathetic with cases of hardship like that; but I think I speak by the book when I say that every member of the Finance Committee, while sympathizing with those people, nevertheless felt that we simply could not agree to the House provision. I understand and appreciate the force of what was said by the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Nebraska. It occurs to me that the best way of carrying out their suggestion, with which I have no disagreement, would be for us to have a yea-and-nay vote on the matter of striking out section 811 of the House text.

Mr. President, I ask that the question of striking out the House provision may be voted on separately from the insertion of the new language, because the new language, as I shall show in a moment, has nothing whatever to do with the subject of the House text.

Mr. COPELAND. Would the Senator resist the idea of sending this back to the committee in order that there may be consideration given to the latest plan which has been proposed by the tax director of my State?

Mr. REED. That is worse than the House plan. Let me show how it would work out. I thought I had given an illustration that would be readily understood. Under Mr. Graves's suggestion let us take the estate of a rich man who died in 1929. We would ignore entirely the value of the estate at that time. We would value that estate now on the basis of the value of the assets at the date of the approval of this act. Then if the executors had made any sales between the date of the death and the date of the approval of the act, of course, we would include those simply at the value at which they were sold. Then, having arrived at the value of the estate by that method, we would impose upon it the estate taxes fixed in the bill now pending.

But we must remember that the estate tax fixed in the bill now pending represents two parts: First, the old estate tax of which the States got 80 per cent, and now a new sort of surtax, all of which goes to the Federal Government. The Senator can readily see that the State would not get 80 per cent of the new tax, but would only get 80 per cent of about one-half of it. The punishment such a provision would inflict on the treasuries of the separate States is much too great to consider. I know that is what the Finance Committee would have to say.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. Graves in his letter said that under his plan it would deny relief to any estate which has not shrunk more than 50 per cent.

Mr. REED. Yes; but practically every estate has done that. I do not know of any estate that has not.

Mr. COPELAND. The Senator would be quite unwilling to have the matter given further thought by the Finance Committee?

Mr. REED. Not unwilling from lack of sympathy with the people who are in trouble or from any lack of respect for Mr. Graves, but from a profound conviction that there is nothing we can do about it, and also from an indisposition to prolong consideration of the bill. It is terribly important that we get the bill passed.

Mr. SMOOT. It is costing the Government $2,000,000 a day.

Mr. COPELAND. I know it is terribly important to get the bill passed, but it is terribly important to do right by the estates which have shrunken so in value.

Mr. REED. I am quite aware of that, and I sympathize with all the Senator is saying and all he is urging, but I know it will not lead to anything. I know if we send this back to the Finance Committee they will have to say there is nothing we can do. If there is any member of the Finance Committee on the floor who differs with me on that, I will withdraw that expression of opinion.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, I realize that if the members of the committee, who have given serious thought to this matter, are not disposed to go further into it because they feel they have exhausted the subject it would be quite useless for me to press it.

Mr. REED. We have considered it at very great length.

Mr. COPELAND. I know the Senator from Pennsylvania sympathizes with many people who are involved.

Mr. REED. I am executor of some estates that would be affected. I would like to see them relieved.

Mr. COPELAND. Of course, from the attitude taken by the Finance Committee it would seem to be useless to press the matter.

Mr. REED. I really believe it is.

Mr. President, I ask that we may have a separate vote on striking out the House language.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the ordinary practice and rule of the Senate an amendment which proposes to strike out and insert may not be divisible. The Chair understands the Senator from Pennsylvania to ask that the question be divided.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, let me remark that inasmuch as the new language relates to entirely different matter, it can scarcely be regarded as an amendment to strike out and insert.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That may be true, but the committee has submitted it in the form of an amendment to strike out and insert.

Mr. REED. I do not think the committee really intended it to be so. I think that was done by the legislative counsel in preparing the amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I believe we should regard the matter of substance, not form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I want to confirm the statement made by the Senator from Pennsylvania concerning the amount of time and thought which the committee gave to the problem involved in this section of the bill. I believe it can be fairly stated that the committee would have been disposed to make some adjustment except for the realities of the situation which confronted the committee. This was not a matter of snap judgment. If I recall correctly, the committee voted unanimously to reject the House language after a full understanding by all of the members of the committee.

In order that the RECORD may show, I want to cite the real situation that would confront not only the Federal Government but the States, should the House proposal or any of the ideas thus far suggested be adopted. The Federal Government would lose practically $40,000,000, $30,000,000 of refunds and $10,000,000 of additional taxes. It might even in the present situation feel that it could be generous in this matter of the revaluation of those estates, but it is a conservative estimate to say it would cost the respective States $150,000,000. Can any Senator contemplate action by the Federal Government which, in the dire financial distress of so many of the States of the Union, at this time, would cost the States $150,000,000?

Furthermore, I want to cite the fact that under the law and under the amendment carried in the bill these estates, in the discretion of the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may remain open for eight years. Therefore, the estates will have, I am certain, in those extreme cases, the sympathetic consideration of the department and will have an opportunity to await a more favorable time to pay the tax during a period of eight years.

I hope when the Senate goes on record in connection with this matter that it will be with the idea of asserting its position against the provision of the House and opposed to any compromise on the question.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I agree with what the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] have said about the committee's careful and deliberate consideration of this matter. However, has the Senator from Pennsylvania considered requiring the Federal tax authorities to accept the valuations already placed on these estates by the States so as to have a harmonious and equal valuation?

Mr. REED. No; and that is a totally different question, which is not involved in this section. I have never heard that question raised in the Finance Committee. Of course, anyone who has had experience with the administration of estates in recent years knows that the executors first have their appraisal made under the State law; then the State tax authorities come on and raise that; and then the Federal tax authorities, feeling that they have to show that they are earning their pay, come on and raise it again.

Mr. CONNALLY. If the Federal Government really wanted to be liberal in this respect, it might do so by accepting the valuation of the State tax authorities.

Mr. REED. I think we shall have to take that up as a separate proposal.

Mr. CONNALLY. I thoroughly agree with the Senator in practically all he has said.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on that portion of the amendment which proposes to strike out section 811 of the text of the printed bill.

Mr. REED. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HASTINGS (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as before, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JONES. Making the same announcement with reference to my pair and its transfer to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN], I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], who is unavoidably detained from the Senate on account of illness. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. BYRNES. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mrs. CARAWAY. I have a pair on this vote with the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD]. I do not know how he would vote if present, and therefore I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. FESS. I wish to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG]; and

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY].

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] has a general pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK]. The Senator from Illinois, if present, would vote "yea." I am not informed how the Senator from South Dakota would vote.

The result was announced—yeas 72, nays 3, as follows:

ADDITIONAL APPROPRIATIONS FOR ARMY AND NAVY PENSIONS

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, the House has passed House Joint Resolution 407 providing an additional appropriation of $12,500,000 for the pensions of veterans, widows, and so forth, for the remainder of the fiscal year. The joint resolution came to the Senate and was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The committee has authorized the joint resolution to be reported and recommends its passage. I report the joint resolution now without amendment and ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 407) making an additional appropriation for the payment of Army and Navy pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the sum of $12,750,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, for the payment of Army and Navy pensions, as follows: For invalids, widows, minor children, and dependent relatives, Army nurses, and all other pensioners who are now borne on the rolls, or who may hereafter be placed thereon, under the provisions of any and all acts of Congress: Provided, That the appropriation aforesaid for Navy pensions shall be paid from the income of the Navy pension fund so far as the same shall be sufficient for that purpose: Provided further, That the amount expended under each of the above items shall be accounted for separately.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am authorized by the committee to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 306, it is proposed to strike out all after the comma in line 23, and all of lines 24 and 25, and in lieu thereof insert the following:

Shall not apply in the case of estates of decedents dying prior to the date of the enactment of this act, to that part of any payment of Federal estate taxes made prior to such date which is attributable to a reversionary or remainder interest in property.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, in a word, the purpose of this amendment is to prevent refunds to be made in any case of a death prior to the passage of the act. We want to prevent the refunding of any tax.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Let me inquire of the Senator is there not some error? In section 811, on line 18 on page 306, there is a reference to section 30 (c) of the revenue act. Section 811 itself, it will be observed, is an amendment to section 305 of the present revenue act, which would seem to be appropriate; but this refers to section 301 (c) and that apparently refers to quite a different matter. There is no 301 (c) in the revenue act.

Mr. REED. There is a section 301 (c) in the revenue act of 1926. Perhaps it would make it clear if we were to insert the words "in the revenue act of 1926."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I have before me the revenue act of February 26, 1926, and there is no subdivision (c) of section 301 in it. There is a subdivision (c) of section 305.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will allow us to pass over that matter for a moment, we will have it looked up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is passed over. The secretary will state the next amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. On what page is the amendment referred to by the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. REED. On page 306 of the pending bill. Has the amendment been agreed to, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not been agreed to. The Chair understood that some question was raised with regard to it.

Mr. REED. No; the question raised by the Senator from Montana has nothing to do with the amendment just proposed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think the Senator from Pennsylvania should make some explanation of the amendment now offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. All in favor of the amendment——

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I trust we may have an explanation of the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I will be glad to explain it. I shall try to make the explanation simple, but to anyone except a lawyer or one who has studied such matters it is going to be a little bit involved.

Under our estate tax laws it has been our practice to value all reversionary or remainder estates at their supposed value at the time of the death of the decedent. That is to say, if I own an estate in remainder or in reversion but not yet in possession, and if I die to-day, the value of that remainder is calculated, based, of course, on the expectancy of the particular tenant, the life tenant; that is included in my gross estate right now, and my executors have to pay a tax on that calculated value.

It has not mattered much in America, because estates of reversion and remainder are not as generally used here as they are in Great Britain; but under the British law, as the Senator knows, it is quite common for life estates to be created with one or more remainder estates to follow thereafter; and they have found by experience that the estate of the remainder man is often quite unable to pay the tax on the theoretical value of the remainder because there is nothing in possession. Consequently the British law provides that when any person dies owning an estate in futuro the tax shall not become due until the life estate falls in.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. May I interrupt the Senator to say that that is taken care of, as I understand, by the amendment proposed by the committee appearing on pages 305 and 306 down to line 22 on the latter page. I understand now the Senator is proposing an amendment to take the place of the provision in line 22 and subsequent lines.

Mr. REED. No; to take the place of the latter half of it. I will explain why it is necessary. The Senator, I see, apprehends easily the purpose of the committee's main amendment.

The matter came to our attention in connection with a case arising in my home city of Pittsburgh, where a comparatively young man who owned an estate in remainder, which he had inherited, died. The life tenant was still living, and the life tenant happened to be substantially younger—she was a woman—than the widow of the man who died. Consequently the widow, who is her husband's executrix, I believe, is forced to pay from the scanty property which she now has a tax on the calculated value of that remainder, although the life tenant is a younger woman than herself; and the probabilities are that the widow will be forced to pay a tax on her remainder interest which she never will live to realize. Theoretically she can sell the remainder, but the Senator knows how uncommon such a sale is in this country and how difficult it is to make the sale of a remainder interest.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I ask how the value of the remainder is arrived at in such a case as the Senator has stated?

Mr. REED. By taking the value of the property as if it were held in present possession and then subtracting from that value its annual increment, with compound interest, for the period of years of the life tenant's expectancy. First, it is necessary to calculate the expectancy of the life tenant, then to take the annual yield of the property during that period, apply compound interest to that, and then subtract that from the present value of the whole estate. It involves a large number of uncertainties, of course, and in this case, as I say, the life tenant happens to be a younger woman than the widow of the man who died owning the remainder interest. Consequently the tax as it has been calculated amounts to almost exactly the same as the total of his other estate. Every penny the man had accumulated in his lifetime for the support of his widow will be taken by the tax on this remainder interest, and she is going to have to live on air and charity until the life tenant dies.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. She may never come into possession of the remainder.

Mr. REED. She probably will not, because she is older than the life tenant.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The probabilities are that she will not.

Mr. REED. As I say, the case had not come up before, to our knowledge, but, knowing the circumstances of this case, I brought the facts to the attention of the Finance Committee, and they said it would be wiser if we were to follow the British system and let the tax fall due when the life estate falls in. Of course, we will get more money then, because the value at that time will be the value of the whole estate and not merely of the remainder interest.

That is one way of doing it. The other suggestion was that we continue the present method of valuation, which is easier, because it enables the Commonwealth to make its calculation of its percentage of the tax and then add interest on that so long as the tax remains unpaid—that is, so long as the life tenant lives the interest is added to the tax which is ascribable to the remainder interest—so that the Government in the long run loses nothing, whereas the taxpayer has to pay the tax when the ability to pay is created.

That is a very long-winded explanation, for which I ought to apologize to the Senate, but I could not make it any shorter.

The purpose of clause (b) of the section is to make it, as amended, apply to this estate in Pittsburgh and any other estate that is in similar difficulties, if there is another. The draftsmen of the language did not get the intention of the committee and they put in a blanket prohibition which would not make it apply to anybody who had died before this act is approved, which is just the opposite of what the committee meant. So the committee authorized me to offer the amendment which is pending.

I have another suggestion to make afterwards.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania, on behalf of the committee, to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Now, Mr. President, to answer the question of the Senator from Montana as to the reference, on page 306, line 18, to section 301 (c), I am sorry that I was unable to answer him promptly when he first asked the question. If the Senator will look at page 289 of the pending bill, he will see that clause (c) is added to section 301 of the revenue act of 1926 at that place—section 802 of the pending bill—and that that deals with the 80 per cent credit allowance. Reading the two together, we find that the draftsmen are right and that the thing is correctly written.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Page 289?

Mr. REED. Yes; page 289, section 802, at the bottom of the page, beginning on line 19.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That will be section 301 then, as amended by this act?

Mr. REED. That will be section 301, subparagraph (c).

The reason for doing that is that on the opposite page, 288, a new subparagraph (b) is added. Consequently the credit provision has to be changed to read "subparagraph (c)." Like the Irishman's joke, it seems to be put in just to make it harder; but it has to be done in this case, I presume.

One further suggestion: Since this paragraph was written I have found that the interest which is allowed and compounded upon the value of the estate in order to arrive at the present value of these reversionary and remainder interests is calculated at 4 per cent. It was I who suggested the use of the figure "6 per cent" in line 1 on page 306. While the committee have been so busy that it has been impossible to get their attention in recent days to trifles like this, I think I can fairly confess that my suggestion of 6 per cent was a wrong one, and that to make this interest rate conform to the rate used in calculating the value of these remainder interests, it ought to be fixed at 4 per cent.

I hope I may confess my error, and move to change the figure "6," in line 1, page 306, to read "4."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment will be agreed to.

The question now is on the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment of the committee as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Title VII—Tax on transfers to avoid income tax," on page 307, after line 2, to strike out:

SEC. 901. IMPOSITION OF TAX

There shall be imposed upon the transfer of stock or securities, by a citizen or resident of the United States or a domestic corporation, to a foreign corporation as paid in surplus, or to a foreign trust, an excise tax equal to 25 per cent of the excess of (1) the value of the stock or securities so transferred over (2) its adjusted basis in the hands of the transferor as determined under section 113 of this act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, in this case the House text is stricken out, and something else is substituted for it. I think that we ought to have an explanation of this.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator desire an explanation of each section at this time, so that he can follow the whole thing?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The explanation deals with the whole subject?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; sections 901, 902, 903, and 904. If the Senator desires, I can make a brief statement of the matter, and then he can follow the sections as read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 307, after line 11, to strike out:

SEC. 902. NONTAXABLE TRANSFERS

The tax imposed by section 901 shall not apply—

(a) If the transfer is for an adequate and full consideration in money or money's worth; or

(b) If the transferee (were it a domestic corporation or trust) would not be subject to income tax under Title I of this act on the profit, if any, from a subsequent sale for cash of the property so transferred; or

(c) If prior to the transfer it has been established to the satisfaction of the commissioner that such transfer is not in pursuance of a plan having as one of its principal purposes the avoidance of Federal income taxes.

SEC. 903. DEFINITION OF "FOREIGN TRUST"

A trust shall be considered a foreign trust within the meaning of this title if, assuming a subsequent sale by the trustee, outside the United States and for cash, of the property so transferred, the profit, if any, from such sale would not be subject to income tax under Title I of this act.

SEC. 904. PAYMENT AND COLLECTION

The tax imposed by section 901 shall, without assessment or notice and demand, be due and payable by the transferor at the time of the transfer, and shall be assessed, collected, and paid under regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary. All administrative, special, or stamp provisions of laws, including penalties and including the law relating to the assessment of taxes, so far as applicable, are hereby extended to and made a part of this title.

And to insert:

SEC. 901. IMPOSITION OF TAX

There shall be imposed upon the transfer of stock or securities by a citizen or resident of the United States, or by a domestic corporation or partnership, or by a trust which is not a foreign trust, to a foreign corporation as paid-in surplus or as a contribution to capital, or to a foreign trust, or to a foreign partnership, an excise tax equal to 25 per cent of the excess of (1) the value of the stock or securities so transferred over (2) its adjusted basis in the hands of the transferor as determined under section 113 of this act.

SEC. 902. NONTAXABLE TRANSFERS

The tax imposed by section 901 shall not apply—

(a) If the transferee is an organization exempt from income tax under section 103 of this act; or

(b) If prior to the transfer it has been established to the satisfaction of the commissioner that such transfer is not in pursuance of a plan having as one of its principal purposes the avoidance of Federal income taxes.

SEC. 903. DEFINITION OF "FOREIGN TRUST"

A trust shall be considered a foreign trust within the meaning of this title if, assuming a subsequent sale by the trustee, outside the United States and for cash, of the property so transferred, the profit, if any, from such sale would not be included in the gross income of the trust under Title I of this act.

SEC. 904. PAYMENT AND COLLECTION

(a) The tax imposed by section 901 shall, without assessment or notice and demand, be due and payable by the transferor at the time of the transfer, and shall be assessed, collected, and paid under regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary.

(b) Under regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary the tax may be abated, remitted, or refunded if after the transfer it has been established to the satisfaction of the commissioner that such transfer was not in pursuance of a plan having as one of its principal purposes the avoidance of Federal income taxes.

(c) All administrative, special, or stamp provisions of law, including penalties and including the law relating to the assessment of taxes, so far as applicable, are hereby extended to and made a part of this title.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I shall be obliged to object to this amendment unless we can have some kind of an explanation of what we are doing.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the report covers the matter pretty well, and I will read it:

The House bill imposes an excise tax upon the transfer of stock or securities by a citizen or resident of the United States or by a domestic corporation to a foreign corporation as paid-in surplus, or to a foreign trust.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I thought we were dealing with the provision on page 307, tax on transfers to avoid income tax.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption? The Senator from Montana will find on page 308 substantially the same provisions as are stricken out on page 307 and the top of page 308. The draftsmen framed the provisions in that way in order to correct a lot of small loopholes, no one of which is very important. The substance of the law remains the same.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator want me to explain the matter further?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. No; that is all right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the heading "Title VIII—Postal rates," on page 310, after line 16, to insert:

(b) On and after July 1, 1932, and until July 1, 1934, on the advertising portion of any publication entered as second-class matter subject to the zone rates of postage under existing law, the rates per pound or fraction thereof for delivery within the eight postal zones established for fourth-class matter shall be as follows:

For the first and second zones, 2 cents.
For the third zone, 3 cents.
For the fourth zone, 5 cents.
For the fifth zone, 6 cents.
For the sixth zone, 7 cents.
For the seventh zone, 9 cents.
For the eighth zone, and between the Philippine Islands and any portion of the United States, including the District of Columbia and the several Territories and possessions, 10 cents.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 1001. POSTAL RATE

(a) On and after the thirtieth day after the date of the enactment of this act and until July 1, 1934, the rate of postage on all mail matter of the first class (except postal cards and private mailing or post cards, and except other first-class matter on which the rate of postage under existing law is 1 cent for each ounce or fraction thereof) shall be 1 cent for each ounce or fraction thereof in addition to the rate provided by existing law.

(b) On and after July 1, 1932, and until July 1, 1934, on the advertising portion of any publication entered as second-class matter subject to the zone rates of postage under existing law, the rates per pound or fraction thereof for delivery within the eight postal zones established for fourth-class matter shall be as follows:

For the first and second zones, 2 cents.
For the third zone, 3 cents.
For the fourth zone, 5 cents.
For the fifth zone, 6 cents.
For the sixth zone, 7 cents.
For the seventh zone, 9 cents.
For the eighth zone, and between the Philippine Islands and any portion of the United States, including the District of Columbia and the several Territories and possessions, 10 cents.

(c) Only 85 per cent of the gross postal receipts during the period the increased rate of postage provided in subsection (a) remains in force shall be counted for the purpose of determining the class of the post office or the compensation or allowances of postmasters or of postal employees of post offices of the first, second, and third classes. For the purpose of determining the commissions (as distinguished from the compensation and the allowances based thereon) of postmasters of the fourth class, only 85 per cent of the applicable cancellations, collections, and receipts during such period shall be counted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am quite sure that there are a number of Senators who desire to discuss this subject.

Mr. GEORGE. They do, Mr. President; and I ask the Senator to let it go over, because I do not want to break in and have the roll called right now.

Mr. SMOOT. I think now would be the best time to take up the subject.

Mr. GEORGE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bailey	Dill	Jones	Robinson, Ind.
Bankhead	Fess	Kean	Schall
Barbour	Fletcher	Kendrick	Sheppard
Blaine	Frazier	Keyes	Smoot

Carey	Hawes	Nye	Walsh, Mont.
Cohen	Hayden	Oddie	Watson
Coolidge	Howell	Patterson	Wheeler

Davis	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What is the amendment, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will again be reported.

The Chief Clerk again stated the amendment.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Alabama moves to amend by inserting after the word "publication," on page 310, line 18, the following words: "except newspapers, religious, agricultural, and scientific publications."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I shall make a very brief statement on this subject, because I am sure that every Member of the Senate familiar with it has given it consideration.

It is seriously doubted whether or not the inclusion of newspapers in the increased postage rates would bring additional return to the Post Office Department. It might result in requiring newspapers to invest at this time in other methods of transportation; and the additional cost, in the present state of their business affairs, should not be imposed unless it would be beneficial in the matter of income to the Post Office Department.

No one can estimate whether or not there would really be any increase in income by reason of this increase upon newspapers; and it is perfectly clear to my mind that the inclusion of agricultural papers, or educational and scientific publications, would be absolutely disastrous to those publications. They are dependent upon advertising. There are a number of agricultural publications, farm journals, and religious journals which have very wide distribution and large circulations.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I wonder whether the Senator would object to including fraternal publications along with the others he mentioned?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I shall be glad to accept that modification of my amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama modifies the amendment to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, the word "educational" is rather broad. Is there any magazine whose editors would not claim that it was educational?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I have not used the word "educational." I will ask that the amendment be again read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read as modified.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 310, line 18, after the word "publication," it is proposed to insert the words "except newspapers, religious, fraternal, agricultural, and scientific publications."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, what mail would be left subject to the committee amendment rates if the amendment of the Senator from Alabama should prevail?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Magazines, certainly, such as the Saturday Evening Post, and periodicals of that kind.

That is all I want to submit on the amendment, Mr. President. I feel that unless this amendment shall be agreed to the result will be that many of these publications will be put out of business entirely.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the effect of the Senator's amendment would be to leave the newspapers and the particular magazines described under the existing rates?

Mr. BANKHEAD. That is exactly the effect of the amendment.

Mr. GEORGE. There would be no increase as to them?

Mr. BANKHEAD. No. The effect would be to leave them as they are now.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I am not in agreement with the committee amendment in regard to second-class mail. I believe that it will be uneconomic and unwise for the Senate to adopt it. I believe it will result in loss instead of gain in postal revenues.

I appreciate as much as any other Member of the Senate the importance and necessity of early passage of a revenue measure that will come as nearly as possible to balancing the Budget and by this means restoring national confidence and protecting the national credit, but I am fully convinced of the futility of any proposed adjustments that are worse than makeshifts and which will probably bring about the opposite result than that expected.

Because of this conviction I am opposed to the committee amendment increasing the rates of postage on second-class mail matter. My reasons for opposing these proposed increases are as follows:

First. It was, I am informed, added to the revenue bill by the Finance Committee without any hearing of the publishing industry, which would be called upon to pay the tax.

Second. The measure of second-class mail rates is extremely technical, and the present rates were established by Congress in 1928 upon the recommendation of a joint commission of the Senate and House after extensive hearings held throughout the United States and had the personal indorsement of the Postmaster General.

Third. If any changes in these rates are deemed advisable, they should be suggested only after complete investigation by the proper committee of the Senate, with adequate hearings of those interested and full knowledge of the actual effects that will result from such changes.

The inclusion of this amendment proposing increases in second-class mail rates in this revenue bill was made by the Finance Committee without any notice to the publishing industry, as I am informed, and without receiving any evidence from those interested. In other words, the Finance Committee by this amendment seeks to restore the highest war-time second-class mail rates without knowledge of the unjust and unreasonable measure of those rates and without realizing the adverse effect such rates would have on the revenues of the Post Office Department.

When the Ways and Means Committee of the House was considering the revenue bill there appeared before that committee the chairman and other members of the Post Office and Post Roads Committee of the House, insisting that because of the technical nature of postal rates that their committee—the Post Office and Post Roads Committee—was the only one that was adequately equipped to pass on the merits of any rate changes, and as a result the Ways and Means Committee of the House unanimously decided that they should not handle such matters but should refer them to the Post Office and Post Roads Committee, with whom jurisdiction rests under the rules of the House.

As chairman of the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, I naturally take the same position and insist that such matters should be recommended only by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads of the Senate, and then only after adequate hearing of all evidence necessary to reach a proper conclusion.

In this connection it is very necessary for us to review past experiences of congressional action in connection with these same postal rates.

For many years prior to the war we gave little or no thought to second-class mail rates. Newspapers and periodicals were carried in the mails at a rate of 1 cent per pound regardless of weight or distance. This was due to a national policy of aiding the distribution of news, information, and literature. But in the emergency of the war Congress raised first-class mail rates to 3 cents, postal cards to 2 cents, put a service charge of 2 cents on each package of parcel post, and provided for four yearly increases in second-class rates. With the passing of the war emergency Congress saw fit to remove the increases on all classes except second class.

In 1925 the President of the United States insisted that if Congress desired to increase the salaries of postal employees, it must also provide increased postal revenues. Congress at that time made such increases in the rates on post cards and on third-class matter that the effect was adverse on the Postal Service and the results were not what was desired.

At that time it was felt that the move was a makeshift and Congress appointed a joint commission of three members each from the Senate and House Post Office and Post Roads Committees so they could make a real study of postal service and rates and make further report to Congress in order that proper action could be taken. This joint commission took 1,752 pages of testimony, visited 10 cities, and rendered its report on May 11, 1926.

As a result of this extensive study by this joint commission and its report to Congress, there resulted legislation in 1928 which restored the 1-cent rate on post cards, made an equitable adjustment of third-class rates, and a reduction in the war-time rates on second-class matter.

I insist that the Finance Committee has gone out of its field in endeavoring to deal with a subject which belongs to another committee which is more familiar with it, and that it is inviting the same catastrophe that has followed similar attempts of the past. I insist that the technical nature of second-class mail rates is more involved than those of freight rates.

Now, let us look a little into the effects of these war-time second-class rates in the past.

I called attention to the fact that the war revenue act of 1917 provided for four yearly increases which began on July 1, 1918. The rate on reading matter was increased from 1 cent to 1½ cents and had its full increase by July 1, 1919. The rate on the advertising portion was increased from 1 cent to a sliding scale by zones, and by July 1, 1919, this ranged from 1½ cents in the first two zones to 5½ cents in the eighth zone. And I would like to call your attention to the fact that these rates that became effective on July 1, 1919, applied to the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and are generally known as the 1920 rates. There were two more increases, effective July 1, 1920, and July 1, 1921, the last ranging from 2 cents in the first two zones to 10 cents in the eighth zone, and these are the rates proposed here by the Finance Committee.

By referring to the annual reports of the Postmaster General we find that during the fiscal year July 1, 1919, to June 30, 1920, when the 1920 rates were in effect, the department handled 599,098,270 pounds of advertising matter as second class subject to these zone rates. In the next fiscal year, July 1, 1920, to June 30, 1921, this was reduced to 507,831,667 pounds, and in the following year, July 1, 1921, to June 30, 1922, when the highest war-time rates first became effective, this weight declined to 422,934,217 pounds, or a decrease of 29.4 per cent in two years.

This is merely one of the facts that was brought out by the investigations of the joint commission in 1925–26 and proved to them that these 1922 rates passed the point of diminishing returns.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I want to emphasize what the Senator has said. Did he make the statement that by reason of the increase in the rates there was a marked falling off in revenue because of the use of other means of transportation of these publications?

Mr. ODDIE. Yes.

Mr. COPELAND. And that amounted to a very considerable sum.

Mr. ODDIE. That is correct.

Mr. COPELAND. Will not the Senator tell us again how much that amounted to? I was quite impressed by what the Senator said.

Mr. ODDIE. In the fiscal year July 1, 1919, to July 1, 1920, when the 1920 rates were in effect, the department handled 599,098,270 pounds of advertising matter as second class, subject to the zone rates. In the next year, 1920 to 1921, it was reduced to 507,000,000 pounds, that is to say, there was a reduction of over 92,000,000 pounds. In the following year, 1921 to 1922, when the higher war-time rates first became effective, the amount declined to 422,934,000, or there was a decrease of 29.4 per cent in the two years.

Mr. COPELAND. Then the practical effect was an actual reduction in income of the Government by this increased rate, because these publications were driven to other means of distribution and abandoned the mails. Am I right?

Mr. ODDIE. Yes; the Senator is right. Furthermore, the Senator will find on looking over the figures that a large part of the postal matter which has been driven from the Postal Service to other means of transportation has not come back to the Postal Service.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. ODDIE. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What is the advantage of retaining it in the Postal Service if it is carried at such a great loss? Why is it not advantageous to let that heavy class of mail go by cheaper means of transportation so long as it is satisfactory to the publishers?

Mr. ODDIE. That is a very difficult question to answer in a few words. It involves many factors. In the first place many large publications are not creating a loss to the department as is generally supposed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Is it not to be assumed that if any publication can secure a cheaper means of transportation an equally safe and prompt means, they will resort to it? They do not use the mails in order to contribute to the revenues of the Government. That is not the primary and controlling factor. Since they do not contribute the amount it costs to carry them, according to statements made here, I should like to have some explanation of why they should not be permitted to seek the least expensive method of transportation.

Mr. ODDIE. It is optional with every publication to use the mail or not. Some publications find it more convenient and cheaper to use other means of transportation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. When I used the expression "permitted" to seek the least expensive method of transportation, I perhaps used the improper term, because they are permitted within certain limitations.

Mr. MOSES. Oh, no, Mr. President. As a matter of fact, the language of the Senator from Arkansas is exactly accurate. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE] has not yet touched upon the reentry privilege, which is exactly what the Senator from Arkansas is talking about, whereby periodicals published in an eastern seaboard city are permitted to have the reentry privilege in half a dozen cities inland. They transport their periodicals to those points by freight. There they stay in the post office awaiting the day of distribution, and then are reentered so they get the benefit of the smaller zone rates.

As a matter of fact, if the Senator from Nevada will permit me to interject this thought, it is not possible to discuss or settle the question of postal rates in connection with a revenue bill. I say that out of an abundance of experience, having been a member of every postal commission which has existed at any time since the imposition of the war-time postal rates, serving under the chairmanship of the distinguished father of the junior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. Having gone through this controversy over postal rates three times in every one of its ramifications, I say it is not possible to deal with the question of postal rates in the discussion of a revenue bill.

In common with the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads [Mr. ODDIE], I have some feeling of resentment that the Committee on Finance should have undertaken to inject the question of postal rates into a revenue bill. I say that in spite of the fact that the postal deficit has been growing from year to year. The reason for that growth I shall hope to explain in a few words after the Senator from Nevada has completed his statement, because I feel that the Committee on Finance—and I say this with no disrespect—is not competent to deal with the question of postal rates, even as a matter of revenue, because they do not know the technical questions which are involved in the carrying of fourth-class mail matter.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I think it will be helpful at this time, as the matter has been referred to by myself and other Senators, for the Senator from New Hampshire to give us a very brief statement of the amount of work which he and his fellow members of the subcommittee devoted to this matter the last time, and the length of time it took.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, in the language of the late Senator Lodge, "that is a large order." The joint select committee of which I was chairman covered the entire country from California to the Canadian line and from the Atlantic to the Pacific, took the testimony of every group of people using the mails in each one of the four classes, consumed a good many months, took thousands of pages of testimony, undertook to harmonize the different points of view which were presented to the commission; so when the Senator asks me to summarize all of that work briefly, it is not possible. Like everybody else who is protesting about the amount of time taken in the consideration of the tax bill, I must say that I do not want to take up the time of the Senate with a discussion of anything that is not germane to the measure before the Senate.

On that particular point I would like to say that all the outcry going on throughout the country with reference to the dilatory tactics of the Senate in its consideration of the revenue measure, to my mind, is wholly unfounded. We received this bill two weeks ago yesterday. I have had knowledge of every revenue bill since that of 1918. I have never known a bill of equal bulk, with the variety of subjects contained, with the controversial matters to be found therein. I have never known a revenue bill of consequences similar to this to be dealt with more expeditiously than this one. While I spoke of some resentment with reference to the action of the Finance Committee in bringing in the matter of postal rates on a revenue bill, I have still more resentment for the unfounded criticism in which the country is indulging in connection with the action of the Senate, so far as this bill is concerned. In two weeks we have practically gone through the entire bulk of a bill of almost 300 printed pages, with thousands of items and thousands of separate amendments.

I say the Senate is not to be censured but, rather, to be praised for the diligence with which it has performed its task. Whether it is to be praised for the wisdom with which it has performed its task remains to be seen; but we certainly are not subject to any censure because of any delay that has occurred here.

With reference to the cordial invitation of the Senator from Nevada to speak about the whole matter of postal rates and their relations to the deficit in the Federal Treasury and their connection with the revenue bill which is now pending, the printed report of the Committee on Finance contains, on page 9, a tabulation which, as I view it, well sets out the situation which exists in connection with the mounting deficit in the Postal Service, contains the recent recommendation which the Post Office Department has made, and will provide $153,000,000 of the $170,000,000 of deficit which the Postal Service now shows.

Mr. President, that tabulation of the increased revenue to be received from the Postal Service might be extended, and helpfully extended, because there is much regarding the postal rates and the revenues derived therefrom of which the public has no notion whatever.

Touching the question of second-class postal rates and touching the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], I can say from positive knowledge that many of the great periodicals which are accused of increasing the postal deficit are, as a matter of fact, at least paying their own way, and probably paying more than the actual cost of their transportation to the Post Office Department. The postal experts themselves, the cost-ascertainment committee, which was set up some seven or eight years ago in the department, and which still continues to function, was compelled to admit that that was the fact.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MOSES. The Senator from Nevada has the floor, but with his permission I am glad to yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ODDIE. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It appears that the members of the Finance Committee are at lunch, necessarily absent from the Chamber. I think those in charge of the bill ought to hear the statement the Senator from New Hampshire is making.

Mr. MOSES. I am entirely willing to defer what I have to say. I am merely responding to the invitation of the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. If the Senator desires to continue the discussion just at this juncture I should like to ask the Senator who has the floor to permit a call of the Senate.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator from Nevada does not have to decline to yield further. I note the suggestion made by the Senator from Arkansas contains a limitation of debate, and I am quite willing to take the floor in my own right at some time.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think the members of the Finance Committee ought to hear the statement being made by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire has emphasized the point I wanted to make, but he has done it much better than I, and that is that his committee worked for months and worked diligently on this problem.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I think the Senator from Arkansas is entitled to a little more complete answer than he received. As I view it, it is a very difficult thing to break down the figures and costs of the operation of the Post Office Department. It is easy to say that this much of the cost should be charged against second-class mail and another proportion of the cost is charged against first-class mail.

As a matter of fact, it is the ambition and desire and effort of every manufacturer to operate his plant at as nearly full time as possible. It has its overhead, its buildings, its costs of operation, and its employees. As a matter of fact, the second-class mail is a deferred mail. It is not handled with the promptness of first-class mail. It fills in the vacant time between the primary activity of the post office, which is the first-class mail, and complete idleness. I think we may feel that there might well be placed a higher charge against the first-class mail. The receipts from second-class mail constitute a part of our income which we may be proud to have and glad to have because of the need for income.

I think these suggestions may have a bearing upon the reasons why it is important for us to encourage the use of second-class mail facilities in order that our post-office plant may be operated at full time.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, the question is what became of the mail matter which I was discussing, which has left the mail service? First, it must be remembered that the Post Office Department has a monopoly on first-class mail only; and, second, that publishers of newspapers and periodicals must solve their distribution problems in the same way as any other manufacturer, and they were able to utilize competing forms of service at a smaller cost than that imposed by these postal rates.

When Congress reduced these war-time rates to the present level it was with the indorsement of the Post Office Department after their own participation in the investigations of the joint commission, and it was the hope that the newspaper publishers and others would restore this traffic that they had diverted from the Post Office Department, but this hope was not realized, as the weight of this advertising matter at zone rates handled last fiscal year was only 498,373,531 pounds. In other words, the horse was already stolen before the barn was locked. And now the Finance Committee, which evidently has not had an opportunity to study these facts, wants to make another blind excursion into this unknown field in a futile hope that it will aid in balancing the Budget.

It is true that the Postmaster General appeared before the Finance Committee and indicated the possibility of raising $5,000,000 revenue by the assessment of these war-time rates on second-class matter, but his estimates were based on the volume of second-class mail matter handled in the fiscal year 1931, which at the present time is continuing to decrease at the rate of 100,000,000 pounds per year. This is due to the continued falling off in national and local advertising. It is therefore evident that these rates could not possibly produce more than about 50 per cent of the Postmaster General's estimate. It must also be remembered that his estimate was based on the assumption that newspapers and periodicals would not be diverted to other means of distribution.

This problem of the diversion of mail matter is considered as seriously by the Post Office Department as the diversion of freight and passenger traffic to motor transportation is considered by our rail carriers.

At various times the Postmaster General has expressed the conclusions of the Post Office Department in regard to second-class mail, and recently he made the following statement:

> Increasing the second-class rates will not increase revenue but will simply drive the business to other carriers that will carry more cheaply than we will.

As late as March 30, 1932, in the course of an address at the Yale Club in New York City, the Postmaster General outlined some pertinent truths in regard to the tampering with mail rates, and I desire to read from that statement:

> As a practical matter, a general increase in the rates for second, third, and fourth class matter would not produce additional revenue. Higher rates for these classes would simply drive a great deal of our business to our competitors, reduce the volume of the mails, and, of course, still further reduce the postal revenues.
> There is another weakness in this reasoning. It completely overlooks the most important characteristic of first-class mail, that is, the preferential treatment which it receives by comparison with mail of all other classes from the time it reaches the receiving post office until it is delivered to the addressees. Naturally this can not be reflected in the cost ascertainment, for, so far as direct costs are concerned, it costs approximately as much to handle an advertising circular as a sealed letter. The point is that the advertising circular in traveling through the postal system is side-tracked over and over again for the sealed letter. The sealed letter has the right of way. At every step it is handled with the maximum speed as well as the maximum security. The circular letter, like all mail matter of the subordinate classes, receives incidental and deferred treatment.
> The cost ascertainment figures accurately state the direct costs of handling the various classes of mail matter. But it must be conceded that direct cost is not the only factor which should be given consideration in fixing rates. If no other factors are to be considered, the rate on a circular letter should properly be the same as the rate on first-class mail, because sooner or later the same operations are required to collect, distribute, transport, and deliver advertising circulars as are involved in handling sealed letters. If direct cost is the only factor which is to be considered in rate making, the telegraph companies should charge the same rate for night letters as for day telegrams. The telephone companies should charge the same toll rates for serving a patron at midnight as in the busy hours of the morning. The railroad should charge the same rate for hauling a carload of iron ore or coal as for hauling a carload of silk. The theaters should make the same charge for seats in the gallery as for seats in the orchestra. No; sound rates can not rest on direct costs alone. They must reflect also the elements of preferred or deferred treatment, fast or slow transit. Particularly, they must recognize the value of the service to the patron.

Mr. President, in reviewing the testimony of the Postmaster General before the Finance Committee on May 3 we find, first, that in response to a specific question by Senator REED as follows: "What recommendation do you make as to the increase in the rates on second-class mail matter?" the Postmaster General replied, "We make no recommendations, Senator, for action in the revenue bill"; and it is also very significant to refer to another statement made by the Postmaster General that should appeal to any Senator as to the soundness of this proposal as a business proposition. I am referring particularly to the Postmaster General's statement:

> We are carrying now only 17 per cent of the potential second-class matter of the country.

We must keep in mind his own statement before the Appropriations Committee of the House that increasing second-class rates will not increase revenue, but will drive the present business away. On other occasions he has indicated that the kind of second class which would be driven away would be the larger newspapers and periodicals on which the department admits there is little or no loss; and now with the knowledge that already 83 per cent of the potential second-class matter is outside the mail the Finance Committee is asking the Senate to take such action as will undoubtedly drive more of it away.

In my opinion, the Post Office Department in this connection is in exactly the same position as our railroads. They have lost a tremendous volume of business to trucks and busses and still within the last year asked the Interstate Commerce Commission for authority to raise their rates in order to recoup their losses, but fortunately the Interstate Commerce Commission did more to save the railroads by refusing that increase than they would have done if they had granted it. In the meantime the railroad carriers have found it necessary to actually make further reductions in their freight rates and passenger rates to meet these competitive conditions.

It is also significant that the Postmaster General in none of his annual reports to the President and Congress has deemed it advisable to recommend an increase in second-class mail rates, and I am sure that any statements he made to the Finance Committee must be considered in the light of his other statements, in which he has definitely opposed increases in second-class mail rates because he firmly felt that it would not produce additional revenues.

I am not speaking in the interests of the large newspapers and periodicals, but in an attempt to show why this burden will fall heaviest upon the small newspapers and other publications, and how it is liable to cost the Government added losses.

We must remember that it is generally not practicable for the small paper to establish its own or to use outside agencies of distribution such as caused the extreme loss of this business to the Post Office Department in 1921 and 1922. We know of the use made by the larger daily newspapers of baggage cars and trucks in effecting their deliveries, some covering practically all points of their distribution and paralleling the rural routes. This was largely caused by the excessive rates of 1922 and the restoration of those rates, as proposed here, would cause further diversions. It must also be remembered that the larger papers come nearer to paying their way because of the higher payment per piece.

The net result of the adoption of this committee amendment will be to force the larger newspaper and periodicals to develop more outside means of distribution which will result in further eliminating them from the mails, and thus reduce the revenue of the Post Office Department. Because of the inability of the smaller newspapers and smaller periodicals to adapt themselves to these other means of distribution they would be forced to remain in the mail and pay an unjust penalty.

The larger papers do not wish to make these additional diversions, but if they go to the expense of further establishing such services because of these higher postal rates, they will undoubtedly retain them regardless of future downward revision in these rates after it has been shown again that another mistake has been made. It will then be too late to correct the error we will make if we adopt this amendment. It will result in increasing the loss to the Government on second-class mail.

Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD a statement showing the number of periodicals that have been recently withdrawn from the mails.

The effect of this amendment will be to throw other publications out of business.

Mr. ODDIE. It will be noted from the statement that 86 periodicals have discontinued publication; that 103 periodicals which formerly constituted 103 separate mailings have merged and the number is now reduced to 50 publications. Then there are indicated also a large number of changes in the frequency of issue, including 9 publications from weekly issue to semimonthly issue; 6 publications from weekly to monthly; 14 semimonthly to monthly; 2 from monthly to quarterly; 1 publication from biweekly to semimonthly; 1 from monthly issue to 8 issues a year; 2 publications from 26 issues per year to 13 issues per year; and 1 publication from quarterly issue to semiannual issue.

It is also shown that there have been announcements by four leading publications that they will combine their summer issues and probably publish only two issues instead of four between May and November.

Mr. President, I will read a letter from the New York Typographical Union, No. 6, dated May 17, 1932, to Mr. F. E. Ware, of the National Publishers' Association, because it contains much illuminating information. The letter is as follows:

NEW YORK TYPOGRAPHICAL UNION, NO. 6.

SIR: After a long period of inactivity toward the unemployed, Congress is considering at the present time an increase in second-class postal rates. This increase, if finally perpetrated by our lawmaking body, will throw out of work a large body of printers. The inconsistency of Congress in this regard is plainly shown when we submit in evidence the fact that Typographical Union No. 6, true to its age-old principles, has been fighting the battle to support its unemployed without Government or State aid. Figure, then, a Government, while remaining apathetic toward the present depression and the unemployment caused thereby, actually considering means whereby it will add to the list of unemployed.

Aside from selfish motives, it is my endeavor to point out to the reading public the broad ramifications caused by an increase in the second-class postal rates. Every government prides itself on a low percentage of illiterates. A low postal rate has been the means of keeping down the rate of illiterates in this country. Newspapers and periodicals turned out in the offices of metropolitan dailies and publication houses have found themselves, through the medium of the second-class postal rate, carried to the outposts of civilization and into the homes of those pioneers who have settled in the hamlets miles beyond schools or other places which disseminate learning. The newspaper and the magazine have been the schools and colleges for these pioneers. An increase in the second-class postal rate will have the effect of destroying these correspondence courses in art and literature. Can the Government afford to make such a grave mistake?

Our own viewpoint as printers comes of the fact that many pieces of literature are distributed gratis throughout the Nation each year. There is poor incentive, then, for the advertiser, who knows full well that the response is problematical, to add to his cost in attempting to broadcast his products to the far-off places where personal salesmanship is impossible.

In this fact lies another damning point against the increase in second-class postal rates. Should advertising broadsides fail to reach into the nooks and crannies of civilization, there can be no demand for the products advertised. In this circumstance every industry will be irretrievably damaged and the return of prosperity in all lines delayed to that extent.

Respectfully yours,

AUSTIN HEWSON, President.

(Sent to each Congressman and Senator from New York.)

On the bottom of the letter which I have just read the following paragraph was added and combined to the subject of the letter which was used as a news release to trade papers:

I urge upon all of those interested in the printing and allied industries, wherever they may be, to bring these facts to their Representatives in Congress, and also to petition the Senators representing their States to defeat this proposed increase in the second-class postal rate.

Mr. President, I shall not say anything further at this time regarding second-class rates. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] will follow me. I will reiterate what everybody knows—that there is no man who has made a closer study of postal rates, or who is better informed in regard to them, than the Senator from New Hampshire.

I shall now speak for a few minutes in opposition to the increase of first-class rates.

I present some interesting data which I have secured on the damaging effect of the proposed raise in first-class postage rates from 2 cents to 3 cents. Only two points should interest us in our consideration of the proposed increase in first-class postage from 2 cents to 3 cents. These two considerations are:

First. Will the increase raise the $135,000,000 promised by Postmaster General Brown? Or what part of it?

Second. If the increase is not probable, is it sound business economy to tax American business organizations an extra 50 per cent for the privilege of conducting business by mail?

Let us summarize the effect of an increase in postal rates. First-class mail is used by three main groups:

(a) The private correspondent. (The smallest group of mail users. The average person would not object to paying 3 cents instead of 2 cents, because it means a difference of only 1 cent.)

(b) Business institutions. (Retail stores for statements; credit companies for collections; public utilities for statements; life-insurance companies for premium statements; banks for monthly statements; manufacturers for dealer, salesmen, and customer routine correspondence; and many other entirely obvious classifications. These firms must use first-class mail or must find other sources of communication or curtail correspondence. This is the second largest group of mail users.)

(c) The third and largest group is composed of business organizations who use the mail to solicit business or to follow up and to increase business solicited by mail, or in other ways. (Members of the second group may be included in this group also, but we want to show the separate purposes.)

In this group are included retailers, wholesalers, dealers, financial, philanthropic and service institutions of all kinds. Nearly every selling or advertising campaign includes mail solicitation. Nearly every national advertiser uses direct mail as part of the selling plan. All charitable organizations use the mail for soliciting support.

It is fairly well established that over 50 per cent of the volume of first-class mail comes from the firms which solicit business through the mail, or which use the mail for securing and maintaining contact with customers, salesmen, dealers, and so forth.

To these firms and individuals 3 cents postage is a real calamity. The 1 cent differential is not the way to consider the effect. The 50 per cent increase must be considered as a $10 increase per thousand letters.

The contention is—

If the rate on first-class mail is raised to 3 cents, the entire volume of first-class mail will decrease. For two reasons:

(A) Commercial mail users in Group B above will be burdened with a discriminatory tax. They will suffer enormous losses—and will find other methods of distribution, such as: Banks will ask depositors to call for statements; public utilities will deliver bills by employees; obvious curtailments can be made in all businesses to the eventual injury of business in general.

(B) Users of so-called mail advertising will not stand a $10 per thousand increase in selling cost and will be forced to mail advertising solicitation by third class. Instead of paying 3 cents per ounce they will mail 2 ounces for 1½ cents—or 1 cent minimum mailed in bulk under 435½ postal laws and regulations. Due to lessened efficiency of third class, these mailers will curtail mailing efforts or find new methods of distribution.

I quote from a brief presented by John A. Smith, jr., of Frank E. Davis Fish Co., Gloucester, Mass., to the Senate Finance Committee on April 14, 1932:

Our company, the Frank E. Davis Fish Co. at Gloucester, Mass., contributes about 45 per cent of the total receipts of the Gloucester Post Office. We used in the year 1931, in one campaign, approximately 1,759,426 pieces of first-class mail. Of this number, 1,558,942 were advertising pieces of first-class mail—advertising our fish. You can readily see from that one campaign that our postal bill was $31,178.84. If the new rate of 3 cents an ounce goes into effect, our bill would have been $46,768.26. That would mean that the Government would receive $15,589 in additional revenue. But it will not work out that way. If this new bill passes the Senate, it will mean that it will drive us from first-class mail into third-class mail, or out of the mails altogether, and thus lower considerably the revenue to our local post office and to the Post Office Department, for instead of paying $46,768 for postage stamps, we will be paying $15,589 under third-class mail. The Government will be losing $15,589 in revenue from what we are now paying, and thus the Post Office Department will not get the revenue that they expect that they will get in a raise in first-class rates.

This statement, by a representative business man, voices a sentiment held by thousands of other business men. In a period of business deflation sales can not be increased by increasing prices.

We must agree that:

(A) A department store selling 100,000 men's shirts at $2 each could not hope to sell the same quantity of like quality at $3 each. Sales would decrease.

(B) Railroad and airplane traffic would decrease if the rate per passenger per mile should be increased.

The same logic applies to first-class postage. Business organizations are willing to pay $20 per thousand letters—$20 per thousand for a service which they know pays the Government an annual profit of from fifty to eighty million dollars. But these organizations will not pay $30 for the same service, a 50 per cent increase, when there is a substitute.

Millions of letters will be diverted to third class or will be taken from the mail entirely. The first-class postal volume will drop just as it dropped when post-card rates were raised from 1 cent to 2 cents. The $10,000,000 post-card volume did not grow to twenty million. It decreased to four million, a loss of six million.

I predict that if 3-cent postage is passed by the Senate, first-class postal revenue in dollars will fall below the present volume.

In order to give an impartial picture of the threatened condition from this proposed increase, I will place in the RECORD following my remarks statements from letters from representative business mail users in response to a survey just made by a publication, Postage and the Mailbag. The original letters are in the possession of this magazine and can be submitted for verification or examination at any time.

With these facts before us, I ask the Senate to maintain first-class postage rate at 2 cents per ounce. In my opinion, an increase will defeat its purpose. An increase will not raise the $135,000,000 revenue, which is a figure obtained by multiplying present volume—thirteen and one-half billion pieces—by 1 cent increase. If the increase will not raise the revenue, which is provable by all the rules of business economics, then why should business be crippled during a trying period by an unjust tax on a valuable method of obtaining business? The rate should stay at 2 cents. The mail user should be encouraged to increase the use of the mail in an endeavor to increase business and to aid in hastening business recovery.

Mr. President, I ask that the extracts from these letters to which I have referred be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EVIDENCE TO SHOW EFFECT OF 3-CENT POSTAGE

"It will not raise desired revenue."

Following are excerpts taken verbatim from letters or signed statements made by individuals quoted:

J. Luther Jordan, W. C. Nabors Co., Mansfield, La.: "To increase the first-class postage is to increase the cost of every contact with those prospects. Undoubtedly we will either curtail our mailings to them or we will use third-class mailing broadsides, or something of that sort. In either case, the postal revenues would decrease rather than increase."

A. D. Hunter, Dixie Canner Co., Little Rock, Ark.: "In our business we use all classes of mail. Should such a tax go into effect on first-class mail, it will mean that much of our mail will be discontinued or will go third class and for 1 cent postage. This most assuredly will not mean more revenue, but less revenue. It would be a tax to the extent of diminishing returns."

Assistant superintendent Goodwill Industries, St. Louis, Mo.: "The bill, asking for a 50 per cent raise in first-class mail, will be very detrimental to our business, and also will necessitate a change in our advertising through direct mail (first class) to some other form. At the present time we send from 50,000 to 75,000 pieces of first-class mail, and from 900,000 to 1,000,000 pieces of mail in all forms per year."

Aichele Bros. (Inc.), St. Paul, Minn.: "If first-class mail will be increased to 3 cents, we will have to distribute our monthly statements with our own office force, similar to the manner used by the water department and the Northern States Power Co. Our weekly direct-mail advertising campaign will be turned into a dodger distributed by hand."

E. D. Madden, sales extension division, Ketterlinus, New York City: "* * * We know that it will diminish (volume of mail). The first-class postage required by the average direct-mail campaign is a considerable item. Purchasers of such advertising material, with an eye to economy always, but particularly so during the present trying times, will be obliged by reason of added cost of postage either to forego the purchase of the material or use third-class postage for such of the mail matter that under the old rates would go first class."

Clarence A. Neal, president the Philadelphia Seed Co., Philadelphia: "At the higher rate business will certainly curtail the use of first-class mail."

John L. Breitwieser, Cave & Cave Advertising Service, South Norwalk, Conn.: "The small business, and Lord knows there are many of them, can not afford space advertising in newspapers and magazines. They depend on the mails. People in our business, that of preparing mail advertising, know that a 50 per cent increase in the first-class postage rate would be a crippling blow to small business. An increase of 50 per cent in the first-class postage rate for the retailers' advertising campaign often means an increase of 25 per cent in the entire cost of the campaign."

Manager Belmont Shop, Erie, Pa.: "Over 50 per cent of our advertising appropriation in 1931 and the first quarter of 1932 was spent on direct-mail advertising, and most of it on first-class postage. A tax on first-class postage will undoubtedly force us and others to cut down our direct-mail advertising appropriation considerably. As a result, both business and employment will decrease—so will the post-office receipts. No one will benefit from it."

Paul C. Scott, president Scott Foot Appliance Co. (Inc.), Omaha, Nebr.: "If the rate is increased to 3 cents, it would absolutely prohibit our use of first-class postage, as the percentage of returns has been running very close to the danger line and an additional 1 cent would show a loss. The only recourse we would have would be to confine our efforts to third-class postage, and if we did that it would positively defeat the purpose of the increase and at the same time work a distinct hardship on us."

Paul E. Clissold, circulation manager Bakers' Helper, Chicago, Ill.: "At the present time we are mailing approximately 405,000 letters per year, all of which go out under first-class postage. If the increase goes in effect, only 45,000 of these pieces, which represent our regular correspondence, will continue to be first class. The remainder, 360,000, will probably all be mailed third class. So at the present time with our mailing 405,000 pieces a year at 2 cents a piece makes $8,100 per year. Figured the other way, with the bulk of this going third class, it amounts to only $4,500."

M. R. Hansen, secretary The Howard Tree Expert Co., Warren, Pa.: "The 2-cent stamp is my salesman; I can't afford to boost his wages 50 per cent, and if he insists on an increase I'll just have to fire him; that's all. We fellows who use direct mail to reach our public have been paying Uncle Sam a profit of $58,000,000 by buying his 2-cent stamps. They tell me Uncle Sam loses money on his third-class stuff. I don't want him to do that. But he's going to make me accept his third-class charity if he gets piggish with this first-class rate."

J. I. Fox, secretary Atlantic Mercantile Corporation, New York City: "It is the pleasure of our organization to use the first-class mail without any due consideration in building up a direct mail, because of what we believe now a considerable and reasonable charge, we would, upon this increase, absolutely cut out all our mail advertising."

R. F. Bjorn, assistant manager Must Hatch Incubator Co., Petaluma, Calif.: "In our organization, for example, we have a small mailing list of 28,000 names. We circularize our list four times per year, using first-class postage entirely. Other mailings we use the lower classes. Our direct-mail selling is done on a strict budget basis. We set aside a specific sum for first-class postage, and this sum will remain the same for any given year, regardless of postage rates. With 3-cent postage we shall be forced to fewer mailings, which means less printing, less paper stock, less this, and less that—a complete slicing off of labor as far as this one item is concerned."

The Barnes Commercial School, Denver, Colo.: "It does seem to me, however, that the provision calling for an increase in first-class postage from 2 to 3 cents is going to work a real hardship on many lines of business that can ill afford the added burden. It will mean in our school an increase in tax of nearly a thousand dollars, and no way to pass it on or secure relief, except to convert all of my mailing to third class."

Charles Q. DeFrance, The Zehrung Co. (Inc.), Lincoln, Nebr.: "But if the proposed 3-cent first-class rate becomes effective, very many of these heavy users of first-class mail will return to third or will much curtail their mailings."

J. B. Howard, treasurer Curtis 1000 (Inc.), Hartford, Conn.: "The discontinuance of direct-by-mail advertising which the passage of this provision of the bill would cause would further aggravate the unemployment condition in the paper, envelope, printing, and advertising industries."

John F. Coleman, Smithboro, N. Y.: "I, for one, will be compelled to either curtail mailings or become a third-class mailer if the new rate is passed. I am having all I can do at present to make both ends meet, and an increase in postage rates at this time will just about wreck my mail-order business. I have written to many dealers in the field, and I have talked with many local business men. All of them agree that they will be compelled to either curtail mailings or resort to third-class mail. A large number of dealers will immediately apply for permits and mail at the 1-cent rate. If all of the dealers I have written to and talked with feel this way about the matter, you can rest assured that every dealer in the country feels the same."

J. A. Cooney, United States Cotton Machinery Co., Fall River, Mass.: "We, ourselves, continually mail thousands of letters each month first class, and should this be raised to 3 cents we know we would not continue to use first class but would substitute third-class mailing."

R. L. Moorhart, secretary-treasurer Bobbs-Merrill Co., Indianapolis: "At a meeting of the board of directors of the Bobbs-Merrill Co. held to-day, the matter of the proposed increase in first-class postage of 1 cent was given careful consideration. It is our very decided opinion that sound business consideration would provide for an immediate increase in the rates of the unprofitable classes of postage to such a point at least that these classes would carry their fair share of the burden. It seems to us absurd that the one class of postage which is paying its way should be selected for an increase."

M. G. Lynch, direct-mail department, the Lea Manufacturing Co., Waterbury, Conn.: "We do considerable direct-mail advertising. Do you realize what this new tax will do to our business? We will have to discontinue a large percentage of our direct-mail advertising, which will naturally decrease our business. This will necessitate doing away with some of the employees in this department, and add a few more to the ranks of the unemployed."

George P. Duncan, manager New England Collection Co., Portsmouth, N. H.: "My business won't stand a tax like that. The only way I can meet it is to cut down my use of first-class mail to an absolute minimum, stop my advertising, fire some help, buy no paper, buy no printing, and 'jest set.' I'm a littler feller. The few dollars of profit lost because of me won't be missed by the Government, although the Portsmouth postmaster told me when I made my last mailing, 'Good, we need the business.' But the big fellers feel the same way. We must use third-class postage or none at all. I can't use third-class postage profitably, so I'll be squeezed out. When I'm squeezed out, my help will be squeezed out, my printer will be squeezed out, and the depression, so far as we are concerned, will be over, and the famine begun."

Hal Hode, director of sales promotion, Columbia Pictures Corporation, New York: "Our direct-by-mail campaigns run from three to five thousand letters per week, and if Congress were to increase the cost of first-class mail 50 per cent, as seems to be its present plan, it would result in making it impossible for us to work with theater owners, and in any event would cause us to very considerably cut down on our efforts to do business by mail."

Charles P. Raymond, president Chas. P. Raymond Service (Inc.), Boston, Mass.: "If Congress decides that the 3 cents postage should become a law, it will mean that we shall cut down on our correspondence; we shall use more post cards, and by no means will we continue to use the amount of postage that we have been using in the past."

C. N. Olcott, Houghton, Mifflin Co., Cambridge, Mass.: "This office is a heavy user of the United States mails. During the year 1931, we sent out mail advertising material aggregating over 2,000,000 pieces. There are certain definite advantages in mailing first class in preference to third class, or in preference to the bulk-mailing regulations; section 435½ postal laws and regulations, although the postage cost of $20 per thousand is the largest element in the advertising expense. If that cost is raised to $30 per thousand, we are forced into a more extensive use of the other rates with their consequent disadvantages, else if we submit to the 3-cent postage, we shall undoubtedly drive up our advertising cost to a prohibitive level."

Ann Lowey, advertising manager Reading Paper Mills, Reading, Pa.: "We want to enter through you our protest against the unfair burden the 3-cent first-class postal rate will place on our business. Instead of helping business along, it will be a detriment to the sale of our commodities, and will also lead us to curtail our advertising through this medium."

C. F. Pendlebury, office manager Veeder-Root (Inc.), Hartford, Conn.: "We are at present spending about $3,000 a year for first-class postage on direct-mail advertising. If the proposed increase goes into effect, we will necessarily have to reduce our volume of mail advertising and switch the appropriation to some other advertising medium. As far as our company is concerned, the Government will realize no more income from an increase in rates."

Leonard Biel, president The Bonded Tobacco Co. (Inc.), New York City: "The company of which I am president sends out one million and a half pieces of 2-cent mail a year. There is not a chance of our continuing to do this if we have to pay a 50 per cent increase."

J. P. Duffy, manager advertising department Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Coal Co., New York City: "This organization has recommended the use of the United States mail to thousands of its retail coal dealers who are selling our trade-marked product known as blue coal, and any attempt to increase the postage rate will result in a curtailment of this effort, and it will force many dealers to resort to door-to-door distribution of handbills and circulars, or force them to use other advertising media."

J. Cooke White, treasurer White & Franke (Inc.), Brookline, Mass.: "We mail around 20,000 first-class letters yearly. A $200 tax means that we must mail only 13,000 letters. If this bill passes, we must cut down our mail; business decreases, income drops, we pay less Federal and State income taxes, the Government loses."

A. O. Leonard, president A. O. Leonard (Inc.), New York City: "In this office we use about $10 a day in first-class postage. If this charge is increased, we will use postage savers and third-class rates on four-fifths of our mail. Will that increase the revenue for the United States from this office?"

H. L. Shallcross, president the Shallcross Co., Philadelphia, Pa.: "Several years ago we had a 3-cent postage and at that time our business was reduced materially, due to the fact that large mailers would not pay, in fact could not pay, the increased postage and still make their mailings profitable. To-day when conditions are much more severe than they were at that time, a 3-cent postage will be ruinous to many firms, such as our own and those in kindred lines, especially firms producing mail matter as a business. It will not increase the revenue of the Post Office Department, as a very large percentage of first-class mail is bulk mailings from business houses in the nature of letters in multiples, regardless of how these letters may be produced."

A. L. Gardner, advertising manager Pangborn Corporation, Hagerstown, Md.: "Our corporation spends thousands of dollars annually for direct-mail advertising. A goodly percentage of this expense goes to the Government in 2-cent postage stamps. During the past two years it has taken considerable persuasion on my part to convince the management that first-class postage is necessary for first-class results. In the advent that postage rates are raised from 2 to 3 cents per ounce for first-class mail, I am certain that we will be compelled to reduce the size of our general mailings and at the same time use third class instead of first, with an annual loss to the Government that will be quite substantial."

E. W. Harrington, president Kojene Products Corporation, Buffalo, N. Y.: "In 1931 our modest appropriation for first-class postage was $3,600. By using third class—and we could just as well do so—our expenditures would have been at least $1,600 less. In my humble judgment that is just what will happen if first-class postage is increased to 3 cents—not maybe—but for sure."

Charles J. Kindt, jr., advertising manager John C. Winston Co., Philadelphia: "This company is a large user of first-class mail. I can state with assurance that an increase in the first-class postage rate would bring about a curtailment of our use of first-class mail, which would also restrict the use of advertising material. Furthermore, it would be necessary to shift many of our large mailings to third class."

W. P. Taylor, president Creditors Commercial Corporation, Buffalo, N. Y.: "I am only one of thousands who use the mails to bring in new business. If you tax me 50 per cent, I am going to reduce my mailings just that amount. And in addition to defeating the tax I am going to defeat the paper maker, the lithographer, the envelope maker, the multigrapher, and the mailman who delivers my letters. Do you catch the significance of this sequence of events? It means a further depression in business."

H. Armstrong Roberts, Philadelphia, Pa.: "An increase in the first-class rates will also mean a sharp decline in first-class mail—the only profitable class—and an increase in the other classes which have always been costly if not unprofitable for the postal department."

J. M. Breuer, Henry Breuer & Son, Fort Atkinson, Wis.: "We mail some half a million pieces yearly, but in order to keep to our budget and not curtail our business, we will mail third class if this measure is passed. An appreciable loss in revenue you will admit, as most direct-mail houses will do this same thing."

B. C. Hedges, business director McCleary Sanitarium, Excelsior Springs, Mo.: "The McCleary Sanitarium, of which I am business director, has an annual mailing expense of from $20,000 to $30,000. Three-fourths of this amount is spent on first-class mail. On an average, our mailing expenses will be increased $10,000 a year. This expense will be an unjust tax upon us inasmuch as we are already paying a rate that enables the Postal Department to make a fair profit. This $10,000 will be our gift to the users of second and third class mail, a fund to help them hold their mailing expenses at a minimum."

H. T. Hamilton, president James-Sanford Agency, Nashville, Tenn.: "In considering my own business, our postage bill for first-class mail—that is, regular mail and advertising—will average around $1,500 per month. Now, with an added tax or burden of 50 per cent of this amount added to what we are already paying, this would simply mean that we would be compelled to curtail a great deal of our first-class mailing, and perhaps become third-class mailers especially on advertising, and other steps would have to be devised whereby we could keep our postage within the approximate amount that we are paying now."

John T. Burns, treasurer Church-Budget Envelope Co., Salem, Ohio: "Last year we spent for first-class postage approximately $12,000. If the law goes into effect instead of the Government receiving $18,000 from us we will use third class to cut it down to about $6,000, or a net loss to this small post office of $6,000."

C. E. Wittmack, vice president Oshkosh Overall Co., Oshkosh, Wis.: "The Oshkosh Overall Co., is the largest user of the United States mails out of the Oshkosh post office. If the increase in first-class rates is enacted, it will cause us and other first-class mail users to curtail the use of the classification to the limit of our ability. It is doubtful whether the anticipated additional revenue from this source will be realized."

C. H. Nelson, jr., secretary Hart Drug Corporation, Miami, Fla.: "We have built a national business during the last five years, without the aid of a single salesman or traveling representative, by the use of letters and samples sent to physicians and druggists throughout the Uniter States. During 1931 we paid to the post office here $35,717.91, which represents approximately 5 per cent of their total receipts. We mailed 1,138,308 letters and 557,271 samples, besides sending some goods parcel post. Of these letters, 796,790 were first class. If the new postage rates go into effect, it will be necessary for us to abandon all first-class letters and send out what letters we send under third-class postage. This would cause our letters to be less effective, and because the letters would be less effective we would have less money with which to send out letters. Our business will decrease and the amount we spend with the post office will decrease."

Asher Charleston, president Standard Dental Products Co., Philadelphia: "I circularize over 30,000 dentists monthly and you can readily realize what the increase will mean, especially in times like now, when thousands of firms like myself are fighting to get out of the red."

President Everhot Manufacturing Co., Maywood, Ill.: "In good times we use approximately one-fourth of all the stamps used in Maywood, and we do not see why we, as an individual concern, should take on 25 per cent of the burden that rightfully belongs to all the people of the community."

Keith A. Hill, Hill & Hill, Springfield, Ohio: "The small retailer can not match advertising space used by department and large chain-unit stores, and these larger advertisers dominate all space-selling mediums. The most effective weapon of the small retailer against his stronger and larger competitor is personalized direct-mail advertising (first-class mail). The small retailer can and does get results from direct-mail advertising. We ask you on behalf of small retailers throughout the Nation to stop the proposed 50 per cent increase in first-class mail rates.

H. C. Baker, secretary Fisher-Stevens Service (Inc.), New York City: "We have for many years been the addressing and mailing department for a vast majority of the pharmaceutical manufacturers and manufacturing chemists east of the Mississippi River. These firms use our service to distribute their advertising matter, at regular intervals, to the entire medical and dental professions as well as all of the retail druggists in the United States and Canada. These lists comprise approximately 300,000 names. Omitting the months of July and August, we are addressing between 5,000,000 and 6,000,000 envelopes and printed matter per month to these lists. Of this amount, at least 1,000,000 are mailed first class. Since being advised through the press that the House has passed this bill, the writer has been in close touch with our customers who have been using first-class mail. They advised him that if this bill becomes a law, they will discontinue using first-class postage. Naturally, they will make use of the third-class privilege."

Thomas A. Peterson, Kansas City, Mo.: "I would much rather support an evenly distributed tax on consumer goods. For if this new rate for first-class postage is passed, I, for one of many, will begin using third-class postage. The first-class postage already shows a Government profit of 17.35 per cent."

A. G. Constant, manager Sign-o-Graf Co., San Francisco, Calif.: "For nine years I was postmaster of a small first-class post office. During that time the postage rates were raised and we were much disappointed in the receipts of our office because of that fact. I am sure that the same thing would happen again. In other words, it will not bring in the amount expected. At present I am mailing out a good many letters each week, just advertising, which is the one way that I have of soliciting business. If the postage rate is increased, it will certainly mean that I will have to resort to some other means for soliciting business. Most of my letters require 4 and 6 cents postage because I send small samples of my work."

Charles D. Greenfield, jr., director of publicity, Montana Life Insurance Co., Helena, Mont.: "We send a constant stream of communications, most of them processed or printed, and 90 per cent of them eligible as third-class matter, to our agents in the nine States wherein we operate. All this material has been mailed first class. If the rate goes to 3 cents, we will go to third-class postage."

King Kelly Marmalade Co., Garden Grove, Calif.: "We mail several thousand letters monthly under first-class postage. Under a 3-cent rate we would have to mail a considerable portion of this under third-class postage and the Post Office Department loses on every piece of third-class mail."

L. W. Goldberg, advertising manager, J. R. Watkins Co., Winona, Minn.: "We are one of the largest users of first-class mail in Minnesota. The following example will show you a possible trend if first-class rates are upped. We had a mailing to go to 8,000 dealers consisting of an announcement letter and order blank. We'd usually send this first class, but in view of the proposed increase, we tried the experiment of sending these 8,000 letters third-class mail under our permit. We made a careful check and found that we obtained almost the same results as first-class mail. Should the tax measure pass and first-class mail be increased to 3 cents, the Government, instead of getting additional revenue from us will get less, because we will practically change over from first-class mail to third-class mail on all our mailings."

Hugo Seren, president Hugo Seren, Inc., Seattle, Wash.: "To increase the cost of direct-mail advertising by 50 per cent, which in our case is $1,500 a year, would mean that we must either cut out entirely, or at least curtail this form of advertising."

William A. Force, president Wm. A. Force & Co. (Inc.), New York City: "Our direct mail advertising about equals the regular correspondence, and in ordinary times, amounts to about 5,000 pieces per month, costing $100 in postage; only $25 more than sending them third-class. We feel the extra results obtained by using first-class mail warrant this extra expenditure of $25 per month, but with the proposed increase, the extra cost would be $75 per month, which is exactly twice the present cost of third-class postage and while not large in dollars and cents, is a considerable item when figured as a percentage of the cost of our mailings."

Mr. Eisele, B. Westermann Co. (Inc.), New York City: "The claimed deficit can hardly be met by such measure, since people will simply refrain more and more from circularization by first-class mail, but avail themselves of cheaper means for that purpose."

The Fechheimer Bros. Co., Cincinnati, Ohio: "If this bill becomes a law, one of two things, or possibly both, will happen in our business. We will either curtail our advertising, or use third-class rate, either of which would hamper our business."

Myron T. Monsen, Thormod Monsen & Son (Inc.), Chicago, Ill.: "We receive all our orders and deliver our goods by first-class mail. This will put a serious tax on our business. We send proofs of type matter all over the United States, and often the postage runs to $2 or $3. We have been in business for 45 years and have built up a unique typesetting service for lithographers and printers, and if our postage is to be increased 50 per cent it will place a burden on our shoulders that we can not carry."

Harold Stedfeld, the H. L. Stedfeld Co., New York City: "If this 3-cent rate is passed, it will paralyze the very method (direct mail) by which business can be bettered. Many firms may stop using the mails to send out advertising, or use third-class mailings and actually reduce postal revenue."

D. E. Victor, treasurer, Association of Army & Navy Stores, New York City: "Speaking for a business which controls the mailing of hundreds of thousands of pieces of mail, I can assure you that at the present time with business conditions as they are, many merchants find the cost of postage interfering with their use of direct mail as an advertising means. An increase in postage will on many occasions eliminate all thought of using the mail for this purpose. Speaking for this association, an increase of 50 per cent is going to mean that we will not mail as much first-class mail as we might otherwise. We will either eliminate the matter intended to be mailed or resort to third class."

Robert A. Stoehr, Robert A. Stoehr (Inc.), Cincinnati, Ohio: "If the increase goes into effect, we will be compelled to either discontinue the large volume of direct-mail advertising we are doing under 2-cent postage and resort to third-class postage. We believe that many, if not most all, of the big direct-mail advertisers will be forced to the same economy."

E. G. Ladewich & Co., Mansfield, Ohio: "The increase to a 3-cent postage is not going to bring in an increase. Last year we sent 60,000 pieces of advertising by first-class mail. Seeing the agitation that was going on to increase the first-class mail to 3 cents, we have worked out our campaign this year on a 1-cent postage basis. So you see there is going to be a loss right there. While 60,000 may mean nothing as far as the grand total is concerned, I am quite certain other firms are working out their problems in the same way."

A. R. Spielberger, manager Cotton Advisory Bureau, Atlanta, Ga.: "The post office would certainly not get the mailing, at the 3-cent rate, it is now getting at 2 cents per ounce. In our line of business we have been using the mails liberally, preferring to send out our mailings, wherever possible, first class. If we had to pay 3 cents per letter, it would no doubt pay us to spend $10 per thousand more in using a better envelope, specially printed, also more elaborate inclosures, and take our chances on third-class mail at 1 cent per letter. However, we would rather see the 2-cent letter rate maintained, and continue to use the first-class mail wherever possible."

H. C. Young, sales manager, Manhattan Paint Co., Cleveland, Ohio: "If this new rate of 50 per cent is passed, we, as one large user of the mails, will have to curtail our mailings or become third-class mailers. And we predict, based upon our inquiry made of many other large users of first-class mail, that by far the majority of us will have to do the same. As a consequence, the additional revenue secured by increasing the tax will fall far short of the Post Office's estimate."

M. Syrkin, president J. J. Murphy Paper Co. (Inc.), New York City: "It will mean a 50 per cent increase in our mailing expenses which, for a firm of our size, is quite an item and will necessitate a curtailment of our mailing circulars, etc., thereby depriving printers of labor, consumption of less paper, cutting down of help, etc.; we would also cut down on our regular mail correspondence to the extent of taking care of only the most important matters."

DeLair & Reger, Oakland, Calif. (Jeanne DeLair): "The psychological reaction to this increase will be a retrenchment on volume of first-class mail sent out by business firms with whom we do business; or else they will resort to the use of a lower class rate. We have experienced that tendency in the past six months."

E. H. Scott, president E. H. Scott Radio Laboratories (Inc.), Chicago: "We send out over 100,000 pieces of mail a month first class. I am absolutely certain this increase will add to the unemployment problem as it will mean reduction in our staff, reduce amount of paper, envelopes, and printed matter generally that is sent out in the mail."

Harold W. Clark, Harold Walter Clark & Associates, Denver, Colo.: "Only one course of action will be open with passage of bill to increase first-class postage. Fifty thousand pieces of first-class mail will immediately become 50,000 pieces of third-class mail."

Bowen, Morrison & Co., New York City: "If this measure to increase postage becomes a law, these (welfare) institutions will cut down on the amount of mail sent, and thus will not add to the revenue. They will have to curtail mailing or become third-class mailers. This will mean a decrease in revenues and a decrease in business, and many worthy institutions will not have funds to carry on."

Mr. Ward Hicks, Ward Hicks (Inc.), Albuquerque, N. Mex.: "It will be practically ruinous to my business. Direct-mail advertising of this office pays the Albuquerque post office several hundred dollars a month. If first-class postage is increased, we will be forced to seek other means of distributing advertising messages. This week, as a test, we delivered 250 letters by Western Union messenger at an hour rate, and at a cost of less than 2 cents per message. Already the direct-mail magazines and trade papers are pointing out the possibilities of using messenger service. Almost all direct-mail advertising which is distributed locally will be delivered by messenger rather than pay a 3-cent postage rate."

Manager, H. Lansdown Co., Everett, Wash.: "First-class mail is the only class showing a profit. If it is increased 50 per cent, we will be forced to cut down our mailings and resort to other forms of advertising to farmers and ranchers, and so reducing the revenue we have been paying to the post office."

R. E. Inskeep, manager United Motor Service, Detroit, Mich.: "With the increase we could do nothing but curtail our mailing expense, and that quite obviously would reduce the post-office revenue besides reducing the business we can now profitably secure through the medium of the first-class letter."

E. C. Knapp, Knapp Book Store, Spokane, Wash.: "The receipts during January, February, and March, 1932, were $39,000 less than during the same months last year in Spokane. We know that part of this loss is due to concerns which have gone to the 1-cent permit mailing and the 1½-cent postage instead of using 2 cents. Customers ask us to use the permit mailing because 1,000 envelopes can be mailed for $10 instead of $20. If the rate were $30 per 1,000, we would expect more firms to use the permit mailing."

H. L. MacDowell, manager the Shaw-Walker Co., Muskegon, Mich.: "At present this department of our business is mailing about 6,000 letters on an average of every 10 days, and first-class postage is used almost exclusively. We much prefer to use first-class postage, because we have found it more profitable, but most certainly would not find our mailings profitable were we forced to consider a 50 per cent increase in the rate. Of necessity we would have to go to third class or cut our mailings about half."

Sales manager Indera Mills Co., Winston-Salem, N. C.: "July to December has been our heaviest mailings. To stay within our advertising budget we would be forced to curtail our mailing the last six months of the year, and this would naturally decrease our business to an extent; we certainly could not stand 50 per cent increase in our advertising by mail on present prices being quoted to our trade, and it would hurt business at this time to attempt to increase price on merchandise."

Frank W. Pearsall, business manager Record of Christian Work, East Northfield, Mass.: "Our small company is typical of the average small American business. Our average annual expenditure for first-class mail is $400. Of this amount only $50 is used for office correspondence. The other $350 covers postage on various forms of advertising, which could be sent under a 1-cent or 1½-cent stamp. It is well worth the additional cost to get this material into the more exclusive first class. But we can not add 50 per cent to the postage cost and continue to make a profit on this kind of advertising."

Thomas James Surface, Roanoke, Va.: "The big mail users and advertisers will simply curtail first-class mailings and increase third class—the same third class that is showing a loss at present."

G. O. Dunlop, secretary Stratton & Stratton, Wallace, Idaho: "We mail about 15,000 pieces a month, with an occasional extra mailing. One cent additional means $1,800 a year. This is not a large sum, but sufficient to drive us to third class."

Ralph S. Foss, director of sales McGraw-Hill Book Co., New York City: "We spent some $15,000 last year on first-class postage, and our business is not large as corporations go. However, should a 3-cent rate go into effect, we would have to reduce our first-class mailings to one-third of last year's volume. If this cut were put into effect by the majority of companies, and we believe most of them will be forced to take this step to offset the increase, the Government would not get any such benefit as has been hastily estimated they would."

Jerome Laadt, president Commonwealth Publishing Co., Chicago: "The 'bulk' inquiries which leave this office are answered under 4-cent stamp (first class) for effect only. It will not be worth 6 cents, so naturally we will go back to third-class mail. For every 100 pieces of mail at 4 cents we now pay $40. For every 1,000 pieces of mail under the new scale we will then pay $15, because we will use third-class mail."

Ivar Hennings, president South Bend Bait Co., South Bend, Ind.: "The postage bill of our company is considerable, and if the first-class postage should be increased it would make considerable inroad, if not entirely wipe out the very narrow profit margin under which we are now operating. Such postage increase would be an added operating expense we could not pass on."

M. Clark King, manager Apex Cleaners & Dyers, Lincoln, Nebr.: "At present we send out 12,000 circulars and 12,000 letters annually at 2 cents each. If the increased rate is passed, it will be necessary for us to eliminate our circulars and use a postcard, which will not be quite as effective for our business. We would undoubtedly discontinue mailing our monthly statements and have our route men leave them with the customer. This would make us a saving of about $500 annually."

Theo. L. William, Bon-Well Floors Co. (Inc.), Bergenfield, N. J.: "The increase is going to have a decided effect on the amount of money we may spent on direct-mail advertising. If this policy is followed by the larger users, as it seems inevitable, there is a question as to whether the end will justify the means."

Earl A. Bickel, Cedar Rapids, Iowa: "It will make it almost prohibitive for me to use the mails at all unless I would go to the ineffective third-class mail."

W. K. Dexter, Hildex Farm, Sugar Hill, N. H.: "I have several thousand customers who order by mail, and in an effort to stimulate business I have done more mailing these past few months than ever before in a like period; but if my postage bill is to be increased 50 per cent, I shall be driven to the necessity of curtailing my mailings or to the use of another class."

Edward F. Carson, Pyle Letter Co., New York City: "It will not increase post-office revenue. The post-office estimate is incorrect, since business will either curtail mailings or use third-class mail."

Forrest C. Reed, manager Federal Life Insurance Co., Marshalltown, Iowa: "This proposed increase would amount to more each month than our office rent amounts to."

H. C. Diehl, secretary Eeloulin Bros. & Co., Greenville, Ill.: "It is quite doubtful that this increase in first-class postage will produce the additional revenue expected. Mailings will be curtailed; third-class mailings and postal cards will take the place of first class; postal revenue will decrease; there will be a slowing up of business, with its resulant harm all along the line."

Harold A. Wallace, manager-secretary Credit Bureau of Will County, Joliet, Ill.: "This office spends hundreds of dollars yearly for direct-mail advertising, together with its regular correspondence. I am certain that if this new rate goes into effect, so far as our own business is concerned, that it will cut down our mailing at least 50 per cent."

Arthur C. Miller, C. Arthur Miller & Son, Elmira, N. Y.: "Ninety per cent of our advertising is direct mail, all of which is first-class mail. If the new rate goes into effect, we will be compelled to seek other methods of advertising."

H. R. Applegate, Applegate Chemical Co., Chicago, Ill.: "In a small business like mine this increase in postal rates would be the last straw, for mine is a 100 per cent direct mail. With reduction in all prices and an increase in mailing rates, it would simply mean mail-order firms would be forced into bankruptcy."

R. A. Stoehr, Robert A. Stoehr (Inc.), Cincinnati, Ohio: "I am convinced this increase in first-class letter postage will not increase the revenue. It may decrease it. Many of the big mail-order houses who now expend many thousands of dollars in first-class postage will change over so as to circulate all their mail matter by third class."

C. H. Eakins, Toledo Mirror Paint & Glass Co., Toledo, Ohio: "It is our firm belief that the advance in first-class mail matter will cause a decrease, rather than an increase, from the fact that business concerns will discontinue using first-class mail on a good deal of their advertising."

H. W. Hilliard, secretary H. W. Hilliard Co. (Inc.), Buffalo, N. Y.: "The use of first-class mail will be greatly curtailed if 3-cent postage goes into effect, as advertising matter will be sent as third-class instead of first-class mail and therefore not yield the revenue estimated. It may result in further reduction in the use of mails which would only aggravate unemployment in the number of industries closely allied to the printing of advertising, manufacture of envelopes, paper, etc. During the year of 1931 our first-class postage bill amounted to a little more than $3,000. To increase the postage on first-class mail from 2 cents to 3 cents would mean no less than a direct addition tax against this concern of $1,500, based on the postage paid last year."

S. N. Farmer, advertising manager India Tire & Rubber Co., Akron, Ohio: "Such a change will necessitate our discontinuing many thousands of first-class letters in our sales-promotion and advertising department. In these mailings there is a certain marginal utility which enters the 2-cent postage rate, enabling us to use effectively about 12,000 letters a month. With the additional tax, it will necessitate our cutting down these mailings to a much smaller number."

H. W. Schwartz, general advertising manager C. G. Conn (Ltd.), Elkhart, Ind.: "This new rate, if made effective, will not increase our cost on first-class mail because we will divert a lot of our mail from first class to third. In fact, we are making definite plans to do so in case this bill becomes a law. This means that several hundred thousand letters which otherwise would have been first class will now be third class. A great bulk of our mail is multigraphed letters, eligible to third class, and if you force us to do so through passage of this bill, we have no recourse except to send it third class instead of first."

W. W. Powell, secretary-treasurer National Benefit Accident Association, Des Moines, Iowa: "I represent a business which makes a great deal use of first-class postage. There are thousands and thousands of such businesses in this country; we are all having a lot of difficulty keeping afloat during these times, and a 50 per cent tax on so important an item as first-class postage will do terrific damage."

H. Clyde Varney, president Advertising Associates (Inc.), Detroit, Mich.: "In cases where definite appropriations have been set, this increase in postage will mean a decrease in quantity of pieces mailed. This reduction will be immediately felt by printers, lithographers, paper companies, binderies, letter shops, and others."

J. Don Alexander, president Alexander Film Co., Colorado Springs, Colo.: "Just now we are preparing for a special mail campaign, but it will have to be abandoned if the high postage goes into effect. Consequently, instead of the Government getting 2 cents from us for each letter sent out in this campaign, it will get nothing, the reason being that the 3-cent rate is prohibitive from the economic standpoint. We believe this example is typical of the experience of many other companies. Much first-class mail will be abondoned entirely, so that the postal department will lose revenue rather than gain it."

R. W. Cossum, Scott, Foresman & Co., Chicago, Ill.: "We mail about a million pieces a year by first-class mail. If the 3-cent postage goes through, pieces that can only go first class will have to be curtailed drastically to come within the budget. For the most part our mailings would go out under the third-class rate. I am sure that would be the case with all large users of first-class mail for advertising purposes."

Howard F. Brazer, supervisor Franklin Fire Insurance Co., Philadelphia, Pa.: "We very frequently circularize our large mailing list, composed of agents of our company, and we feel sure that if this bill is passed it will be necessary for us to curtail our mailing, and this attitude will be adopted by other concerns."

D. W. Patterson, vice president Gospel Trumpet Co., Anderson, Ind.: "I know that so far as our own company is concerned it will work against the Government as regards revenue; we will be forced to find some other way of getting our direct-by-mail advertising to our customers. It is a certain thing that our first-class mail will be greatly decreased if the 3-cent rate becomes a law."

Lester Abrahamer, Lester (Inc.), Camden, N. J.: "This increase means a tremendous tax on a small business on our regular office and collection mail, which must go out under the first-class rate. In our instance it will give an increased burden of fifteen times the regular taxes we now have included in our overhead. It is a very serious matter, and we will have to make every effort to get around it, as we can not stand the burden at this time."

W. L. Handley, advertising manager, Bank Savings Life Insurance Co., Topeka, Kans.: "I know from experience that those who now use a great number of 2-cent postage stamps will certainly be forced to reduce their mailings if 3-cent postage goes into effect. In this case the revenue would not be increased, but rather decreased."

M. D. Ogden, advertising department, Crescent Engraving Co., Kalamazoo, Mich.: "If this bill is not killed, direct-mail advertisers will necessarily have to resort to third-class mail, and then what has been gained?"

J. G. Gates, Gates Dental Co. (Inc.), Lancaster, Pa.: "If all business houses using mail, as we do, are forced to pay the additional postage on first-class matter, we feel very sure that the mailings will be greatly curtailed. We know we will reduce our first-class mailings very materially, seeking every possible way open to us to avoid that type of mail matter."

F. L. Swanson, secretary-treasurer A. I. Root Co., Council Bluffs, Iowa: "All of our business is direct by mail. Though our business is comparatively small, we use approximately $2,000 worth of first-class mail each year. To increase this 50 per cent would make it almost prohibitive for us to do business. The result would be that our business would be much less, our pay roll reduced greatly, and there would be the possibility of its forcing us to close our business."

D. Coalson, secretary-treasurer Walker Smith Co., Brownwood, Tex.: "Our own firm reaches all over Texas and into three adjoining States. Our postage bill ranges from $700 to $850 per month. We now mail all our statements and invoices directly to customers; but before we would suffer a penalty of 50 per cent in this first-class mail we would merely have all of our bills delivered by a messenger who visits all of the merchants anyway, and we would have all of our statements delivered by the salesmen who visit all of the merchants weekly."

A. D. Watson, jr., treasurer George S. Carrington Co., Chicago: "Our firm sells exclusively by mail. We restrict our selling to letters mailed first class only. We employ no salesmen and never have in the 48 years we have been in business. Therefore we are not to be confused with the many firms that use all classes of mail for catalogues, flyers, and so on. Essentially, then, in view of the above fact, a raise in first-class rates of 50 per cent is a rise in our selling cost of 50 per cent. Such an increase in the face of present business is unthinkable. With the necessity of reducing selling prices, there is no chance of in any way absorbing it. Our postage bill from April 30, 1930 (fiscal-year basis), to April 30, 1931, was $60,721. A 50 per cent in first-class postage would inflict a penalty on us of over $30,000 yearly. Our firm is only one of the thousands who would find themselves in the same predicament if this feature of the bill is allowed to become law."

C. F. Gelling, president Commercial Service Co. (Inc.), Chicago: "Much of the matter we send through the mails is for advertising purposes. If cost of sending this matter via first-class mail is increased, we are going to reduce what we use and put it in other forms of advertising, which is exactly what other business men will do, with the result that there will be a large reduction in the use of first-class mail."

J. D. Colegrove, Harrison-Colgrove, Denver, Colo.: "A raise in the rate of first class would decrease my investment in first class, and it is my sincere opinion this would be the general result."

B. I. Rosental, secretary Cyko Mailing Service, Yonkers, N. Y.: "A number of our customers, who formerly did summer mailings, are making no plans whatever for direct-mail publicity in the summer of 1932 because of the probable increase in first-class mail."

N. L. Folger, N. L. Folger Co., New York, N. Y.: "We use the mail exclusively for advertising and with a 3-cent first-class rate will be forced to go to third class. I think this will be true with many other advertisers, with the result that the additional revenue will not be realized."

Melvin Cahn, Guaranty Washington Co., New York City: "Present first-class mailers will either curtail mailings or become third-class mailers if the new rate is passed."

Henry L. Wriston, secretary Ministers' Mutual Life Insurance Co., Boston, Mass.: "It will slow up business recovery; it will greatly burden certain industries who use first-class mail in advertising. This company writes insurance by mail. It will greatly handicap our business. I am persuaded it will reduce the income from first-class postage, owing to the great reduction in amount of postage actually used."

President Samuel Schlossmans & Sons (Inc.), New York City: "We are large users of the mails and feel that the exorbitant increase resulting in the cost of our postage bills will force us to curtail our mail-advertising activities considerably."

S. E. Wardell, president S. E. Wardell Advertising Co., New York City: "The advertising profession meets daily the necessity of convincing business men of the advisability of using first-class rather than third-class postage for its psychological effect upon the prospect. Now you are about to kill the work in this direction which has been accomplished by advertising men since the foundation of the advertising profession."

Horace Blitz, Roeblee Advertising, Atlantic City, N. J.: "Thousands of direct-mail agencies in the country, faced by a loss of business by passage of this bill, and endeavoring to maintain existence, will be compelled to divert first-class mailings to third class, acknowledged by the post office as a losing proposition."

Henry Knighton, Samuel Knighton & Sons (Inc.), New York: "We are considered the largest users and receivers of first-class mail in the New York produce exchange, and should this bill be finally passed we would be obliged to cut our first-class mailings by one-half, and in our business it would not pay us to use third-class mail."

F. Harvey Morse, secretary Howell-Morse (Inc.), New York City: "It seems to me that the estimate of additional revenue is largely illusionary. A large number of those first-class mail users will use third class rather than pay a 50 per cent increase."

George F. Gottlieb, New York City: "I will be compelled to curtail my direct-by-mail advertising 50 per cent, and in my line of business this practically means ruination."

Secretary Citizens' Fund Mutual Fire Insurance Co., Red Wing, Minn.: "It will put a heavy burden on the small-home owners and on the small-town business men and farmers who do business through the mail with our company, and also works the other way around, through added expense on our company because of the fact that, being a mutual company, any increased expense comes directly out of the savings to the policyholders. Furthermore, it will necessitate to try to keep our postage bill down, the use of as much third class as is possible but which is not, by far, as efficient as first class."

Ralph P. Thompson, Perrin & Thompson (Inc.), Winter Haven, Fla.: "We are selling a considerable amount of fruit direct to the consumer, and mail is our means of advertising. We have sent out over 35,000 letters by first-class mail this year, and if there is an increase in postage we will have to use third-class mail, which will probably mean less business."

Fred D. Osman, proprietor New Brunswick Nurseries, New Brunswick, N. J.: "In my small '1-man' business I use over $1,000 of first-class postage a year. In these times, when active sales effort is so necessary, an increase of $500 per year becomes an overload that is very near the breaking point."

Oliver Cabana, jr., president Liquid Veneer Corporation, Buffalo, N. Y.: "This corporation mails on an average 10,000 advertising letters per day under 2-cent postage, its outlay for postage alone being $60,000 per year. Now, in all candor I wish to say to you that this form of advertising can not stand an increase in postal rates and we will be obliged to either discontinue it or adopt the unsealed letter and 1-cent postage instead. We have made tests by using unsealed letters with 1-cent postage, and notwithstanding the lower postage cost the results were not quite as good as the sealed 2-cent letter, which attracts more attention. Still, after paying the 2-cent postage, the difference in results is so small that we would probably all adopt the 1-cent letter rather than pay the proposed rate."

Oechler & Kopp, Brooklyn, N. Y.: "Practically our entire business is handled by first-class mail, probably 30,000 pieces of matter annually, and we believe it is rather unfair to increase our burden 50 per cent, with second, third, and fourth class mail being unaffected. A large amount of business is developed through first-class mail, and if the expense of developing this business becomes too great, it only means a loss all around."

E. R. Chatterton, sales manager E. W. Twitchell (Inc.), Philadelphia, Pa.: "We, like many other concerns, do practically all of our business by mail, inasmuch as the margin of profit even in good times is not sufficient to warrant our paying out large sums of money for traveling expenses. Even in a comparatively small company, such as our own, an item of this kind amounts to quite a little, as we do send out quite a few thousand letters in a month's time, and a 50 per cent advance in our postage bill is going to be just another one of those items which tend to retard business recovery."

Freeman P. Taylor, president the Taylor School, Philadelphia, Pa.: "Our company makes use of this class to a great extent during the year, and it would impose a heavy additional expense on us. In fact, I believe it would compel us to employ another type of mailing if the 3-cent rate is made lawful. It is my firm belief that this would be the case with hundreds of schools throughout the United States, thereby imposing a heavy loss to educators if they still used first-class postage."

Samuel Whitman, Pittsburgh, Pa.: "At present, with first-class mail at 2 cents, third class does not have the standing and importance that it will have when thousands of business houses forget all about 3-cent first-class mail, and concentrate all their mailings under the third-class arrangement. This will mean that at present the one department of the Post Office which is paying, and that is the first-class division, will be turned into a losing division, and the expected revenue will be greatly reduced."

Edward H. Quimby, Dover, N. H.: "From January 1 to April 13, 1932—an off year—I have spent $633.30 on direct mail, $66.90 on letters, bills, etc., and probably in excess of $50 on parcel-post shipments. If first-class postage is increased to 3 cents, I shall feel compelled to use third-class postage, almost entirely, for direct mail."

R. K. Noye, Noye Co., Buffalo, N. Y.: "Our salesmen are the United States mails; the most efficient salesman in that organization is the first-class mail; the 1½-cent and 1-cent mail salesmen have their uses but the real work is entrusted to the first-class section. Now, we are threatened by a 50 per cent increase in that classification, which is a menace to our business and to all who use the mails for advertising and selling. If we were selling bolting cloth at a 25 per cent profit and elevator buckets at a 25 per cent loss, we would not think of imperiling our bolting-cloth trade by increasing the price of that line, but would rather try to increase the price of elevator buckets or to decrease the cost of handling and selling them. That would be the business way, unaffected by politics."

Simon A. Goldsmith, secretary Baltimore Clothes (Inc.), Baltimore, Md.: "The increase of 50 per cent in postage will undoubtedly remove from the mails hundreds of pieces that now ordinarily use this method. We are a large user of first-class postage for advertising, but the proposed increase can not help but have its effect in cutting down our use of the mails for this purpose. In citing our own opinion, we feel sure that we are voicing that of others who are following the same procedure."

Miss S. Fudman, the J. E. Fricke Co., Philadelphia, Pa.: "We have expended during the course of 1931 many thousands of dollars for postage used in advertising our products. If we are forced to pay 3 cents for our postage instead of 2 cents, which will mean 50 per cent additional, we will be compelled to curtail our advertising by mail and use some cheaper form. In this way the Government will not benefit as much as under normal conditions."

Manager the Toren Printing Co., Grand Rapids, Mich.: "We protest against legislation that is sure to take business away from the printer at a time our volume is already far below normal. And it is manifestly unfair to tax the only class of postage that—according to published statistics—now pays a profit of more than 17 per cent."

W. P. Exline, vice president William Exline (Inc.), Cleveland, Ohio: "Please be advised, that if the 3-cent postage bill is passed, it will practically ruin our businss. At a time like this, when concerns are struggling so hard to get business and really get business started upward again, this extra 50 per cent tax on direct first-class mail will certainly be a deathblow. Our concern is primarily a mail-order house; and if you double our mailing costs during this period of falling prices, it will throw all of our employees out of work."

A. F. B. Klein, A. F. B. Klein's Antiseptic Laundry, Chicago, Ill.: "In view of the extraordinary conditions which prevail in the laundry business, it would seem unfair at the present time to raise the cost of advertising."

Harry L. Coit, secretary the Bridgeport Pen Co., Bridgeport, Conn.: "Eliminating the circularizing of a product consequently decreases the possibility of promoting its consumption. Eliminating circularizing programs would further tend to curtail the use of thousands of items that make up such programs, with its attendant loss of employment to skilled labor absolutely necessary for its production."

J. M. Grolimund, H. & A. Selmer (Inc.), Elkhart, Ind.: "Inasmuch as we have found that we can operate our business more profitably by mail than by salesmen, you would be increasing our cost of operation by passing any bill that would increase the cost of first-class postage."

W. A. Freeman, Collins-Moore & Co., Louisville, Ky.: "We have made it a practice to furnish our clients with various information on securities they now hold by use of the mails. Of course, we realize absolutely no revenue from such a service. We do not feel that it would justify us to continue such a service by first-class mail if the rates were boosted on us. On the other hand, as a security house it would not be advisable to use third class, so the practice would probably be discontinued."

H. H. Epperson, Steele-Siman & Co., Sioux City, Iowa: "I was in Omaha last week in conference with some public-utility people, and understood from them that if the 3-cent rate went in they intended and had been making a national survey to eliminate the use of postage in delivering of all bills. This would be a big item, and no doubt it could be done and considerably cheaper by personal delivery than 3-cent postage. Understand that the Gas & Electric Co. of Des Moines, Iowa, have planned on this procedure."

President Lincoln Extension University (Inc.), Cleveland, Ohio: "Our institution is a home-study school and is required to make extensive use of the postal facilities to conduct our business. If this proposed increase in postage becomes a law, I feel it will force our institution to do one of two things: Either we will have to cease putting new business on our books until more favorable postal rates are again in effect or we shall have to resort to the use of third-class mail on quantities of mail that are now going first class. To make use of the latter privilege, it will result in a lesser revenue to the Government than it is now receiving from our institution."

The Arthur M. Rosenberg Co., New Haven, Conn.: "The Post Office estimate of $135,000,000 additional revenue if this measure goes through is incorrect, for the reason that present first-class mailers will either curtail mailings or become third-class mailers."

Circulation manager the Traffic World, Chicago, Ill.: "In our circulation department alone we mail in excess of 100,000 letters at first-class rate each year soliciting subscriptions. This doesn't include our general correspondence and our letters to present customers soliciting the renewal of their business. If the postage rate is increased from 2 cents to 3 cents a letter, it will raise our postage expense $10 a thousand, and as a result most of our sales material will go out under the 1-cent rate. In effect, therefore, the Postal Service instead of getting $2,000 revenue on this mail will collect only $1,000."

Mr. G. P. Haywood, Haywood Tag Co., La Fayette, Ind.: "Haywood Tag Co. is comparatively a large user of advertising through first-class mail. We are willing to pay 2 cents each to send out our advertising letters, but we will not pay 3 cents. If the proposed increase to 3 cents for first class is put into force, our first-class mailing will be discontinued and we will use third-class mail."

J. F. Kugan, Economy Furniture Co. (Inc.), Scranton, Pa.: "You will find one example in the following of what will happen if the proposed increase is made in the first-class postage rate; for a number of years our average expenditure for postage stamps has been about $5,000 a year. We are using first-class mail almost exclusively. If the proposed change is made, we shall in self-protection send at least two-thirds of our mail as third class. We believe that it will be found the same practice will be adopted quite generally."

William G. Wineor, jr., president Rhode Island Welding Co., Providence, R. I.: "If this tax is levied on first-class mail, it will be the 'last straw.' The change from first to third class mail in the conduct of direct-mail advertising and selling may cause the first-class mail, now operating at a profit, to face an actual deficit, for first-class mail will be used only where it is absolutely necessary. Let us stop 'robbing Peter to pay Paul' and put the burden where it belongs—on the other classes."

Mansur B. Oakes, president Insurance R. & R. Service, Indianapolis, Ind.: "We feel that the increase would create an awkward situation, that it would interfere with the plans of large numbers of business men, and instead of producing an increase in net revenue for the Government will have the opposite effect, that instead of using first-class for direct-mail advertising, the open-letter rate will be used, so that the revenue to the Government will be less instead of more."

J. M. Bedford, Kramer's, Akron, Ohio: "We wish to draw your attention to the fact that should the proposed tax on first-class mail go into effect, we will not only curtail on our direct-mail advertising but drop into the third-class mailers on the balance of the amount which we would do. At present we use approximately $1,200 worth of stamps per year, which represents approximately $208 profit; under the new proposed law we would use $900 worth or less, decreasing the profit to $150.

R. I. Bartholomew, vice president Publishers Printing Co., New York City: "First-class mail at the present time is largely used for circular letters. An increase of 50 per cent in postage will pretty nearly destroy this industry with the result that not only will this business suffer, but the receipts to the Government for first-class mail will actually be less rather than more."

R. C. Overacker, Poughkeepsie, N. Y.: "Just a word from one who pays a fair amount for postage throughout the year—represent one of many thousands. In the past I have sent all mailings first-class. If the increase to 3 cents takes place, I shall be obliged to mail third-class. The Government will lose rather than gain."

L. E. Fifer, sales manager E. A. Wright Co., Philadelphia, Pa.: "For years we have been extensive users of direct mail in the development of our business which was organized 60 years ago. The cost of securing business on this basis is high enough as it is, but with the large number of first-class mailings that we make yearly, 3 cents each would add a greatly increased burden to our present high cost of obtaining business. It would unquestionably result in our reducing our first-class mail to a considerable degree."

Lloyd Williams, Detroit, Mich.: "But with a 50 per cent increase in the cost of first-class postage it would not only be likely but certain that I would use third-class postage in these mailings. So as far as my mailings are concerned, and doubtless a vast number of mail users of the same sort, the Government would lose 25 per cent of the revenue from these mailings instead of gaining 50 per cent."

Lewis H. Carris, managing director National Society for Prevention of Blindness, New York City: "In common with many other similar agencies, we shall be particularly hard hit."

Dean W. Geer, president Dean W. Geer Co., Oshkosh, Wis.: "A 50 per cent increase on business mail at this time is bound to result in a great curtailment of the use of first-class mailings, and thus seriously affect the paper industry of the State as well as printers, envelope and ink manufacturers, and a number of allied industries."

M. E. Bews, sales department, Davidson Rubber Co., Boston Mass.: "We have found that contacts made by first-class mail, and followed up by third-class mail will bring excellent results. If the first-class mail is made 3 cents, it will simply mean that we will have to abandon our practice of sending our advertising by first-class, and substituting to some degree the third-class mail."

Don Herold, Los Angeles, Calif.: "My own postage tax (and I'm just a writer and advertising counsel) will be more than my income tax if this postage increase goes through."

J. C. Leahy, sales promotion department, Basian-Morely Co., La Porte, Ind.: "With the 3-cent postal rate in effect, it would be necessary for us to curtail direct-mail advertising, which is now being sent out first class. This would undoubtedly result in a loss of business to others as well as ourselves and contribute to the general unemployment situation."

Royal H. Miller, general sales manager Turner & Seymour Manufacturing Co., Torrington: "Our business is entirely a mail-order business, and it will do us serious harm to have this increase actually take place. Much mail now sent under the first-class rate will, if the postage increase goes into effect, be transferred to third class."

A. E. Puls, vice president the Fort Massac Chair Co., Cleveland: "Our company spends thousands of dollars a year in our direct-mail advertising, using first-class mail exclusively. To get our share of the business, or more if possible, our direct-mail advertising appropriation for the next 12 months is almost double what it has been during the past 12 months. If, however, first-class postage rates are increased, we shall most certainly reduce the amount of our mailings, or shift over to third class."

F. P. Berrington, sales manager Hascall Paint Co., Cleveland, Ohio: "However, if this bill should pass the Senate and receive the President's approval, we can truthfully state that we shall be compelled to curtail our mailings to a very considerable extent or become third-class mailers."

Arthur Clifford, chairman of publicity, Christ Episcopal Church, Bridgeport, Conn.: "Our parish sends out in excess of 3,000 pieces of first-class mail each year to our congregation, and with budgets as hard to raise as they are right now, we will simply have to cease such methods or use third-class mailings."

Miss Mary F. Dowd, Dowd Letter Shop, Chicago, Ill.: "Do not place it all on the business mail users where it is bound to result in great curtailment of first-class mailings effecting the paper, envelope, and ink manufacturers and printers and letter services generally throughout the Nation. I personally interviewed over 50 of my customers, and they have all emphatically stated that they will decrease the use of first-class mail if 3-cent postage is passed."

Edward P. Gates, Gates-Ways to Travel, Belmont, Mass.: "The imposition of this increase will practically make it impossible for me to continue solicitation of business by first-class mail. If this is true in my case with only a small business, it will obviously be even more true with large business concerns. The net result will be less postal returns for the Government and less business activity. This in turn will result in less employment and this will result in less Government income from taxes."

B. H. Harris, Harris, Reading, Pa.: "We feel sure that, like ourselves, first-class mail advertisers will either curtail mailings or become third-class mailers if the new rate is passed."

Arthur F. Williams, president Trade Circular Co., Chicago, Ill.: "One of our customers for whom we mail out every 90 days 10,000 under 2-cent stamp, and for whom we are getting out 10,000 now, says when the 3-cent postage goes into effect, he will use third-class matter and send out 15,000, at a cost of $225 instead of 10,000 at a cost—2-cent mail—of $200."

R. M. Gamble, Happ Bros. Co., Macon, Ga.: "We would regret exceedingly to see this legislation go through. We would be obliged to resort almost entirely to third-class postage in our direct-mail advertising. In anticipation of the passage of this bill, we are already experimenting with third-class mail, whereas in the past we have used first class exclusively. Our total mailing probably will be around 300,000 pieces each year, which, of course, will represent quite a substantial sum from our angle on postage."

W. A. Carran, president Valley Oil Co., Cleveland, Ohio: "Should this become a law we will have to curtail our mailings in order to overcome the expense, and the tax, instead of increasing revenue, will have the opposite effect, for curtailing mailings will mean less printing, less paper, ink, glue, etc., being used, and add to the constantly increasing ranks of unemployed. Lastly, it will mean no more revenue for the Government."

C. O. Warner, sales manager Rice Bros., Geneva, N. Y.: "Any sales-promotion work that increases consumption of any product will provide just that much additional employment. In our business, where we use a large amount of 2-cent mail in sales-promotion work, we are making plans to use more 1-cent postcards and 1½-cent mail, if the proposed 3-cent rate goes into effect."

Charles Gustafson, Jam Handy Picture Service (Inc.), Detroit, Mich: "Increase in first-class postage will seriously handicap this effort, and possibly result in complete curtailment. Such a reaction would affect not only Government revenue and our business volume but also printers, engravers, and other craftsmen."

Robert L. Eminger, secretary-treasurer American Pulp & Paper Mill, Miamisburg, Ohio: "Our association uses first-class mail to a large extent each and every year, as well as the Parcel Post System, and should we be forced to pay the increase of 1 cent per ounce for each letter it will cause us to curtail our mailing list to actual requirements for members only."

F. W. Osincup, sales manager CaPhenin Chemical Co., Waverly, Iowa: "If this measure is passed, this company will largely discontinue the use of first-class mail as an advertising medium, and will use instead third class almost entirely."

David E. Fisher, the Brownie Folks & Associates, Hummels Wharf, Pa.: "The passing of this bill will cause me and others to curtail our mailings considerably and to use third-class mail in place of first class. Revenues will decrease and business will decrease, and God knows business is at a low enough level now. Absolutely no good will be accomplished by the passing of this bill."

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, in expressing my objection to increasing Government revenue by substituting the 1921 postal second-class matter schedule for the present second-class postage rates, I ask that a letter from the owner and publisher of the leading daily newspaper of the Northwest, the Minneapolis Tribune, be read; also a letter from the publisher of the St. Paul Daily News.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letters will be read.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

THE MINNEAPOLIS TRIBUNE,
May 11, 1932.

Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR SCHALL: Although I have given more or less thought and study to the problem of newspaper transportation costs in this Northwest territory and elsewhere for the past 40 years, I can not sense the wisdom of the Senate Finance Committee in its decision to increase Government revenue by substituting the 1921 postal zone second-class-matter schedule for the present second-class postage rates.

While the present rates, which have been in force during the past four years, are high in comparison with rates charged for newspaper distribution in ways other than through the mails, the reinstatement of the 1921 schedule would serve to force from the mails millions of tons of newspapers and periodicals into other channels for delivery.

Since the end of the World War we have sought relief from rates enacted as a war revenue measure—rates that are an increase of approximately 100 per cent over pre-war rates. And finally, after eight years of effort on the part of publishers, Congress in 1928 gave us some relief by enacting the second-class-matter schedule, under which we now operate.

If the 1921 schedule is restored, the average rate in the eight postal zones for newspaper space devoted to advertising matter would be increased 47 per cent over the present schedule. The per cent of increase in the various zones would range from 33⅓ in the first and second zones to a maximum of 66⅔ per cent in the fourth zone.

It is quite obvious that in the present economic situation the proposed advance in newspaper postage rates would be practically prohibitive to publishers of northwest metropolitan newspapers. It would simply force them to abandon the mails wherever possible and substitute other and more economical means for distributing their product.

I confidently think you and I are agreed that an advance in postage rates of 33⅓ per cent in the first and second zones and 50 per cent in the third zone for that portion of the publication devoted to advertising matter is excessive and not reconcilable to the prevalent economic situation.

If the 1921 schedule were reinstated at this time I could not pass the toll along to my subscriber by advancing the subscription rates of the paper, nor do I feel that I could afford to pay the Government those confiscatory rates.

I think in all sincerity that if you were in my place you would view the situation about the same as I do. As I see it, Senator, if this proposed advance in rates is for the purpose of raising revenue, the Government will fail in its undertaking.

As for my own case, about 90 per cent of the Minneapolis Tribune's country circulation that is distributed by mail is in the State of Minnesota and eastern North and South Dakota. With the construction and extensive improvement of highways in our circulation territory during the past 12 years the motor vehicle has taken a conspicuous place in northwest transportation delivery service.

Trucks, busses, and automobiles are rendering efficient newspaper-delivery service at considerably less cost to publishers than can be obtained by using the mails.

Railroads offer a newspaper baggage rate ranging from one-half cent to nine-tenths cent per pound, according to zone, nine-tenths cent being the maximum rate. You will please note how these rates compare with the 1921 mail charge of 1½ cents per pound for reading matter and 2 and 3 cents per pound for advertising space (2 cents in zones 1 and 2 and 3 cents in zone 3). Newspaper baggage and mail are handled on the same train. A Twin City trucking concern renders an excellent newspaper-delivery service for seven-tenths cent per pound.

The foregoing rates apply in Twin City territory. In other sections of the country that are more densely populated motor delivery and baggage newspaper rates are less than in the Northwest.

While the newspaper will continue to use the mails, the volume of business sent through the mails would be greatly reduced, and revenue obtained by the Government from this source on an increased rate would not compensate for the loss caused by reduction in volume. It would be practically prohibitive under the 1921 schedule for the Minneapolis Tribune to deliver by mail the volume of newspapers now being handled in that way.

The first and second Minneapolis and St. Paul postal zones comprise the territory within a 150-mile radius of the Twin Cities. Newspaper baggage and truck delivery rates for Twin City newspapers in this territory range, according to distance, from one-half cent to three-fourths cent per pound. The 1921 postage rates in the same territory are 1½ cents per pound for reading matter and 2 cents per pound for advertising.

It is obvious that the disparity between the baggage truck and postal rates would result in transferring all shipments possible from the mails to other channels of delivery. The situation in this territory is not unlike that in other sections of this country. If the 1921 zone rates are restored, what happened in 1921 will recur in 1932, namely, the advance in newspaper postage will divert thousands of tons of publications from the mails to other channels for delivery, and the Government will suffer a loss rather than an increase in revenue.

I trust, Senator, you will give the matter due consideration and bear with me in my contention that this is not the time to advance second-class postage rates.

Yours truly,

F. E. MURPHY, Publisher.

THE ST. PAUL DAILY NEWS,
May 20, 1932.

Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In the proposed new revenue-producing tax bill that is being considered by the Senate at the present time, there is under consideration an increase in second-class postage. This is a matter that has been thrashed out by publishers of the United States and Congress on several occasions.

It is my firm conviction that second-class mail users produce a very large percentage of first-class mail. Practically every advertisement that appears calls for correspondence by first-class mail. The increase in second-class postage would put out of business a large number of national publications that cater to rural subscribers. As you probably know, the so-called mail-order advertising has been decreasing very materially the last three years. It is almost impossible for these publications to exist with the present volume of advertising they are receiving and the added burden of increased postage would be more than they could bear, and many of them would have to discontinue.

This class of publication running mail-order advertising produces a great amount of first-class postage because every advertisement calls for a reply by first-class mail, and the elimination of this class of publication would mean a decrease in your first-class postage that I believe would amount to more money in the long run to the Post Office Department than the anticipated increase in second-class postage would produce.

It is admitted that first-class postage is handled at a profit. However, I heartily agree with the idea of charging 3 cents for letter postage, as I believe that the Government should handle the Post Office Department on a profitable basis as a whole.

Newspapers of the United States will pay a large percentage under first-class mail, amounting in our case to a good many thousands of dollars each year. This, we think, is just and proper.

So far as second-class postage is concerned, records show that for our publication this class of mail has gone down ever since 1928. We have been forced in competition with other daily papers in the Twin Cities to have our papers sent to small towns throughout the State by truck, which we find is very much cheaper than by second-class postage, and on account of the elimination of trains we make much better time.

While our total circulation has remained approximately the same, our circulation has gone in some measure from second-class mail to trucks. This means that the farmer who formerly took a daily paper at his home can no longer do so, because of the price, and if second-class postage is increased, as anticiapted in this tax bill, it will probably be necessary to increase the subscription price to him still further.

There has been an intensive campaign on small-town circulation because of the cheap transportation charge. As the matter stands in Minnesota at the present time, small-town inhabitants are reading daily papers more than ever and the farmer is reading less than ever. This condition is wrong, and it should be the reverse. The farmer is entitled to his daily paper the same as the city men, and he should be permitted to have it without excessive cost.

For your information, I am giving you herewith a record of our publication showing the amount of money that we have paid the Post Office Department during the period from 1918 to 1931:

1918, old rate	$38,699.91
1919, first step	53,110.68
1920, second step	67,841.45
1921, third step	75,440.71
1922, fourth step	77,436.19
1923, fourth step	77,180.70
1924, fourth step	76,941.06
1925, fourth step	89,440.49
1926, fourth step	97,313.72
1927, fourth step	93,900.26
1928, July 1, revised	73,900.26
1929, July 1, revised	63,141.04
1930, July 1, revised	53,595.79
1931, July 1, revised	44,882.53

You will remember the old rate was in effect in 1918. Steps 1, 2, 3, and 4 were then put into effect and remained for six years. In 1927 Senator MOSES was chairman of the committee to investigate second-class postal rates. The result of his exhaustive investigation was that in July, 1928, the present rate was put into effect. You will note that under the fourth step our postage rate was increased considerably. This was due largely to the increased size of our paper, due to advertising.

In 1928 the farmer's products became unprofitable and you will note from the record that thereafter subscriptions were discontinued in large numbers. The present tendency for 1932 is downward.

It would appear that the increase in postage means an added burden only to the rural route man and the farmer, adding a further burden to his already overloaded shoulders. An increase in second-class postage does not mean anything in the way of additional expense to the small-town subscriber or to the city subscriber. The entire burden will fall upon the rural routes.

In view of the fact that the Senate Finance Committee did not go into the justice or injustice of this increase in second-class postage nor allow publishers the privilege of being heard before this committee, we would like to urge that this particular subject be referred to for investigation by the House and the Post Office Committees where it has been handled heretofore, and where they have all the records of the investigations that have taken place.

We are not trying to evade our just share of the taxes, but we believe it is a hardship on the farmer who is already overburdened.

We thank you for your cooperation.

Respectfully yours,

N. W. REAY.

Mr. MOSES obtained the floor.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield for that purpose?

Mr. MOSES. I yield for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-five Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me?

Mr. MOSES. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. I have two unanimous-consent requests which I desire to submit. They are the usual requests always presented during the consideration of a tariff bill or a revenue bill. I send them to the desk and ask that they be submitted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

I ask unanimous consent that in the engrossing of the amendments of the Senate to House bill 10236, the revenue and taxation bill, the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to make such changes in such table of contents as may be necessary to make such table conform to the action of the Senate in respect of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The clerk will read the second request.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

I ask unanimous consent that in the engrossing of the amendments to the pending revenue bill (H. R. 10236) the Secretary of the Senate be authorized—

(1) To make such clerical changes as may be necessary to the proper numbering and lettering of the various portions of the bill, and to secure uniformity in the bill in respect of typography and indentation; and

(2) To amend or strike out cross references that have become erroneous or superfluous, and to insert cross references made necessary by reason of changes made by the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. There is one more request I desire to prefer, Mr. President. I ask unanimous consent that when the pending bill is passed, it be printed, showing the Senate amendments numbered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, there are two points upon which I find myself in disagreement with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE], the chairman of the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, first, with reference to his altogether too generous reference to me as an authority in matters of postal rates, and, second, in the position which he has taken concerning the proposed increase in first-class postal rates.

Under an emergency such as now confronts us, and discovering anywhere in the governmental activities a source of income as productive as the increase in the first-class letter rates, as easily to be collected, and presumably resting so lightly on those who have to pay it, I am of the opinion that that portion of title 8 in this bill should be accepted.

It will be remembered that 3 cents was established as the rate upon first-class mail during the war, under circumstances almost exactly like those which now confront us; that is to say, the necessity of securing much revenue easily and quickly, and, so far as I know, there was no expression of resentment anywhere in the country against that.

I have always thought that the Congress made a great error in selecting that particular element of our tax laws as the first step in the reduction of the tax burden which the war had laid upon us. If we had continued the 3 cent rate, the Postal Service would have been infinitely better off, and no one would have materially suffered. Accordingly, Mr. President, I hope that that portion of title 8 may be agreed to.

The amendments which the Senate Committee on Finance have made to this title, however, seem to me to be open to very grave objection. In the first place, if they should all be agreed to, the revenue to be produced, at the maximum, would be but $5,262,000, and it is my opinion that even this meager figure of increased revenue could not be procured.

Members of the Senate who are at all familiar with the newspaper business, or with the publishing business in general—and I am happy to note that the fourth estate has increased its representation in this Chamber in recent months—those of us who know something about the ramifications of the newspaper business or the publishing business in general, well understand the diminution in the number of impressions which is taking place in every press room of the country, and well understand the diminishing advertising content of all the periodicals which are published in the country, and well understand what the effect will be upon that diminishing advertising content if a further burden in the way of postal rates is laid upon it.

The fact is that in the slender part of the testimony which the committee took upon this subject there is substantially nothing of consequence which warrants the conclusion which the committee reached. Whereas, on the other hand, upon page 9 of the testimony will be found tabulated the recommendations which the Post Office Department has made concerning rates, recommendations which are now pending before Congress in one House or the other, and which, if adopted, would practically wipe out the existing postal deficit, leaving it at any rate only about $16,000,000 a year, a deficit, may I say, Mr. President, which means nothing to the people of the country, who, in my opinion, have no special desire that the Postal Service shall be made self-sustaining, but who want from the Postal Service as much service as is possible for the money which it costs.

Mr. President, I join the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads [Mr. ODDIE] in his expression of indignation that the Committee on Finance, with so slender a volume of evidence to support it, should have undertaken to make such sweeping changes in the schedule of postal rates, involving so many and so diverse interests as these. The Senate Committee on Finance could not possibly under any circumstances have the background or knowledge regarding the Postal Service, regarding the revenues received from this, that, or the other class of mail, to enable it to have established the schedule of rates contained in the amendment which the committee has proposed. If second-class postal rates are to be amended even temporarily, covering a period of only two years, it is my contention, in common with that of the chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, that the subject should have been dealt with by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, where will be found all the information growing out of previous investigations and where will be found the opportunity to secure the expert information which is necessary in such a revision.

The revision here proposed is a mere rule-of-thumb method, with slight information upon which to base any estimate of what it will produce and even, as I have said, if it produces the maximum it would be but little over $5,000,000. I am firmly of the opinion that there should be another scrutiny of the entire schedule of postal rates. It is now nearly eight years since those rates have been studied with any view to revision. Manifold changes have taken place in the transportation system of the country within those eight years. Manifold changes have taken place with reference to the relative volume of the four classes of mail. If postal rates are to be revised, that revision should not take place hastily as is proposed in this amendment, but should take place, as the prayer book cautions those who are entering into the state of matrimony, advisedly, soberly, and in the fear of God.

Mr. President, if the Committee on Finance seriously intended to study the postal situation with a view to increasing the public revenues, it could not possibly have contented itself with dealing only with the second-class postage. There is another class of postage which, to my mind, is as great an offender as those who use second class, but wherein there happens to be a group of advocates whose vigor has not thus far been overcome. I am speaking of the fourth class, the parcel post.

Under the administration of Postmaster General Burleson, the method of pay for the transportation of all classes of mail by rail—that is to say, that item in the postal appropriation bill under the title of inland transportation of mail—was changed from weight to bulk, and we now purchase transportation for mail by so many linear feet in a standard car, and yet we continue to sell transportation of mail by weight. The consequence is that fourth-class mail, the parcel post, comprising more than 60 per cent of the total cost of the mail, the basis upon which we pay for transportation, more than 60 per cent of the weight of mail, the basis upon which we sell transportation, yields less than 27 per cent of the total postal revenues.

Whenever we have attempted to deal with that special privileged class of mail matter we have been confronted with the anguished cries of those who still send up their clamor to Heaven in behalf of the farmer, and we have been unable to lay upon that class of mail the burden of service which it receives because of its benefits to agriculture. Yet only one-tenth of 1 per cent of all the parcel-post packages in the country either originate or are delivered upon rural free delivery routes. If the postal-rate schedule is to be reexamined for the purpose of assuring enlarged and immediate revenues, I can not understand why the Committee on Finance should not have chosen that class of the mail for its purpose.

But to return, Mr. President, to the proposal contained in the committee amendment with reference to second-class mail matter, let me point out that the great cost to the postal service is contained in the item of labor. Each individual piece of mail has to be handled so many times from the moment it enters the post office until the moment it reaches the hands of the addressee. In second-class matter there will be found not only the newspapers and the periodicals, but there will be found also a class enjoying a special privilege, the class known as religious, educational, agricultural, and so forth, classifications.

These publications number more than 6,000. They range in size from periodicals of more than 100 pages and weighing nearly 2 pounds each, down to single leaflets of two pages requiring more than 100 to the pound, and hundreds of them comprising no more than four pages and running more than 60 to the pound. These periodicals have a privileged rate of 1¼ cents per pound all over the country, regardless of zone, regardless of the weight of their advertising contents; and yet I venture to say that more than two-thirds of those 6,000 newspapers and periodicals are newspapers and periodicals in the true sense of the word, are published in competition with legitimate newspapers and periodicals, a competition which extends to advertising and circulation, and yet which enjoy this preferential treatment that probably costs the Government more than $50,000,000 a year.

That, Mr. President, is the second of the catalogue, which might be extended, of the discriminations which exist in the postal service and which can not be dealt with in any slapdash fashion, such as is now proposed in this amendment in connection with the second-class mail matter.

I have already said, in the course of an interruption which the Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE] permitted me, that the Post Office Department itself has admitted that many of these larger periodicals now pay their way and some of them, which run to the higher weights, more than pay their way. The discrimination now proposed in this amendment seems to me to be so objectionable in its character, so futile in the amount of revenue which can be raised from it, even believing that the total maximum estimate is correct, that it should be rejected in toto, the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] should be withdrawn, and the Senate should reject the proposal which the committee has presented to it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I am willing to withdraw the amendment so we can have a direct vote on the whole provision——

Mr. MOSES. I thank the Senator.

Mr. BANKHEAD. With the understanding that if the entire provision is not defeated then I shall reintroduce the amendment.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I believe that we could profitably reexamine the whole question of the Postal Service, that we could profitably revise the entire schedule of postal rates in every class. In connection with that examination and revision I think there could be developed here—although I am not sure that this is the place to develop it—some legislation which would make the Postal Service a little less complex so far as its being understood is concerned, a little more efficient so far as some branches of its ramifications are concerned.

What I mean by that is that the bookkeeping system in vogue in the Post Office Department is archaic beyond expression. It is not possible to obtain from the Post Office Department a single set of figures with reference to rates from the various classes of mail which will be accurate. Estimates? Indeed, yes; without number. The Senate during the consideration of this bill has been fed up with estimates. No one of the estimates emanating from the Treasury Department could possibly have been as misleading as many of the estimates which from time to time have been laid before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, as it has studied the question of postal rates.

I once asked the most experienced, and certainly the cleverest, of all postal employees whom I have ever met if he could give to the subcommittee, of which I was chairman, a statement of the receipts of the Post Office Department for a given quarter from each of the four classes of mail. He could not do it. I then asked him what he would think of a wholesale dry-goods establishment which could not tell at the end of the year how much it had received from the sale of silk or laces or velvets. Of course, the answer was silence.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, in justice to the Treasury Department, I want to say that they made no estimate at all. That was left entirely to the Post Office Department, and the estimates we have on this matter are the estimates of the Post Office Department and not the Treasury Department.

Mr. MOSES. Yes; I said at the outset that they would find upon page 9 the estimate of the Post Office Department as to what this amendment would produce at the maximum.

Mr. President, these facts are well fortified by masses of testimony taken by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and by various postal commissions which have been set up by joint action of the two Houses of Congress and upon each one of which I have had membership, the first being the great Postal Commission—I say "great" because of the senior personnel which it then contained, its chairman being the former beloved Senator from Alabama, the father of the sitting Senator from that State [Mr. BANKHEAD]—down to the joint select committees which have taken testimony in recent years.

Upon the background of all that experience, Mr. President, I protest against the adoption of an amendment such as the committee has proposed; and I say that if the Congress or if the Senate wishes to get information upon which a complete revision of the postal-rates schedule may be made, and possibly a complete reorganization of the Postal Service—a subject to which some Senators are warmly devoted just now—the way to do it is through a resolution of the Senate or a joint resolution of Congress, but not through thrusting into legislation such as this bill is, a rule of thumb, a slapdash proposal such as the one presented to us by the committee.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, the Post Office Department is nothing but a public utility; it operates for revenue; and it is a ground for condemnation of Congress that it allows a public utility to be operated by the United States at a loss of $170,000,000 a year.

It is not a difficult matter to determine what is the cost of carrying the various classes of mail, and it is a question which should be determined. Then, after being determined, if Congress sees fit to subsidize particular classes of mail, that is what should be done. I am not here urging that each class of mail should pay the cost of carrying it, although, as a general principle, that should be the case. However, Mr. President, now, when we are in such a state of mind that we are willing to adopt economies and to make efforts to curtail, is the time to act, for when we are flush we are inclined to be negligent, and we have been negligent in this case.

During the last seven or eight years there has been a deficit of $600,000,000 in the Post Office Department, and we have allowed it to go on without any constructive attention whatever. I have an amendment which I have prepared and which I propose to offer. It proposes that the 3-cent postage rate shall go into effect; that it shall remain in effect for the next year; that in the meantime the Interstate Commerce Commission shall investigate the cost of carrying the various classes of mail; that at the end of the year, when Congress has an opportunity to consider the rates proposed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Congress may make appropriations for subsidizing particular classes of mail. Then there will be no concealed subsidies whatever, and the Interstate Commerce Commission will be able to take into consideration any subsidy authorized and make the rate accordingly.

Moreover, I propose that there shall be a class of stamps for franking purposes; and that the Government of the United States shall pay its share for carrying franked mail. In other words, my amendment, if adopted, will put the Post Office Department upon a business basis, the Government paying what it ought to pay; each class of mail paying what it should pay, less any subsidy which Congress may see fit to provide.

Mr. President, in that way we can place the Post Office Department on a business basis; we will have no more difficulties about deficits; it will be operated so that we may be proud of the results and not ashamed of them as we should be now, because, as I have said, although the Post Office Department is nothing but a public utility, operated for income, we are operating it in such a slipshod manner that there was a deficit of $170,000,000 last year.

I have an amendment which I propose to offer. It has received the approval of a previous Postmaster General; in fact, he wrote me that if such an amendment could be put into effect the problem of the Post Office Department would be solved. My suggestion is right along the line of that of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES], because it provides for an investigation before the proposed second-class rate shall be put into effect. It further provides for putting into effect the 3-cent rate until the end of the next fiscal year, when we can make a general readjustment should we see fit to do so.

Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I am sending to the desk, and ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is another amendment pending.

Mr. HOWELL. That amendment was withdrawn, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Did the Senator from Alabama withdraw his amendment?

Mr. BANKHEAD. In order that the situation may be made clear, let me inquire, in the event the committee's amendment should be adopted, would I then have the right to offer my amendment exempting newspapers and other publications?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator would not have the right to offer such an amendment in the place where he has offered it unless there should be a reconsideration of the vote whereby the committee amendment was adopted.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am willing to withdraw my amendment for convenience and to save time and for the purpose of reaching a direct vote, but I do not want to waive the right, unless it becomes necessary, to act directly upon the provisions of the amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill a question. As I understand, the Senate committee amendment involves some $3,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. There are $5,000,000 involved.

Mr. HARRISON. Why can we not have unanimous consent to vote viva voce on that recommendation; and then, if it is adopted, that any Senator may offer an amendment to it.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator from Nebraska desire to have action upon his amendment now?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question first is on the committee amendment, because the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska proposes to strike out the House text as well as the committee amendment.

Mr. HOWELL. No; I beg pardon, Mr. President.

Mr. MOSES. Why should it not be well to adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi and simply have a unanimous-consent agreement that a viva voce vote be taken on the Senate amendment, and then, if it is agreed to, that any amendment may follow?

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, the amendment I have offered does not strike out the House provision for a 3-cent rate on first-class postage, and it will not affect the action of the Senate on second-class mail, because I have not provided in my amendment that there shall be a charge or no charge on second-class mail.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair state that the wrong amendment was handed to him. The first amendment does provide for striking out a portion of the House text. The Chair is now advised that he had the wrong amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, may the amendment be stated so that we will know just what it is?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 310, line 10, it is proposed to strike out "1934" and insert "1933," and on page 311, after line 18, to insert the following:

"SEC. —. (a) The rates for each form or classification of postal service shall be based on the actual cost thereof, but no rate shall be reduced below that in effect during the fiscal year of 1931; and, subject to the foregoing limitations, said rates shall be fixed and determined from time to time by the Interstate Commerce Commission, subject to the same legal provisions, rules, and regulations now in effect respecting the determination of railroad and express rates: Provided, however, That where Congress shall from time to time make special appropriations to the end of reducing the charge for any particular service, then, and in such case, said Interstate Commerce Commission shall take into consideration such special appropriation or appropriations in determining such rate or rates as though the same were derived from payments for such service.

"(b) The Postmaster General shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to provide an additional form and series of postage stamps to be known as franking stamps, which shall hereafter be affixed to all official and other mail now entitled to the franking privilege, and in the same amount or amounts as in the case of mail matter not entitled to free delivery. Such stamps shall be delivered, upon proper receipt therefor, to officials and others entitled to the franking privilege; and the Interstate Commerce Commission shall take into consideration the amount of such stamps used in lieu of regular stamps as postal income from the various classes of postal services.

"(c) During any period any increased rate of postage fixed pursuant to the provisions of subsection (a) remains in force, only the receipts which would have accrued at the rates in force on the effective date of this section shall, until otherwise provided by law, be counted for the purpose of determining the class of the post office or the compensation or allowances of postmasters or of postal employees of post offices of the first, second, and third classes, and for the purpose of determining the commissions (as distinguished from the compensation and allowances based thereon) of postmasters of the fourth class.

"(d) This section shall take effect July 1, 1933."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. MOSES. Will the Senator permit me to ask a question of the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. MOSES. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska is clearly a complicated piece of postal legislation. I wonder if the Senator would be willing to accede to a motion which I should like to make, that the proposal of the Senator from Nebraska be referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads? I think the chairman of the committee will agree with me that the committee will promptly give a hearing on the proposal and promptly report it to the Senate.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, this amendment has already been before the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. MOSES. It certainly has not been heard.

Mr. HOWELL. It has not been referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads at this session, but it has been referred to that committee in the past. It is a proposal that I have had in mind for a long time, but felt that I could not get any action on it and I was anxious to present it now when we are of a mind for economy. Such a time always affords the opportunity in great enterprises to introduce such reforms; and if we pass it over now we will forget about it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HOWELL. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. As I heard the amendment read there are a number of things in it which I should like seriously to consider, but we have not time to do it now. I think perhaps the best thing to do would be to accept the amendment and let it go to conference, and we will see whether there is anything we can do under it that would enhance the revenue of the Government from first-class postage. I have no objection, if the Senate has none, to accepting the amendment and letting it go to conference.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I could not hear what the Senator said.

Mr. SMOOT. I say that I see some benefit in the provision.

Mr. NORRIS. Whose provision?

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment of the Senator's colleague.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. I have no objection to that, but the pending amendment as I understand is the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] was just read.

Mr. NORRIS. I heard it read.

Mr. SMOOT. From the statement the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] has just made about the amendment and from hearing it read—and that is all I know about it; I have not given any study to it—it seemed to me to contain suggestions worthy of consideration.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no doubt of that; I am not objecting to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the Chair suggest that the discussion is out of order; that the committee amendment is now before the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. But I wanted to finish my statement so the Senator from Nebraska may know that, so far as I am concerned, I should like to see the amendment offered go to conference, and then we will check up on the conditions and the facts with the department and see if we can get some advantage out of it, that is all.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield a minute, I do not think that that amendment has any bearing on the committee amendment, and it can be offered separately afterward.

Mr. SMOOT. That is another thing to which I was going to call attention.

Mr. FLETCHER. Let us vote on the committee amendment, and then the Senator from Nebraska can offer his amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought at this time we had better get through the whole thing at once.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the Senator from New Hampshire a while ago indicated that the Committee on Finance had not given any consideration to the proposed amendment to second-class rates. I want to advise him, although I am in doubt whether the hearings were printed or not, that on May 3 the Postmaster General appeared before the Finance Committee and testified in connection with that matter.

Mr. MOSES. I hold the printed copy of that hearing in my hand, and there are nine pages dealing with a matter involving $170,000,000.

Mr. COUZENS. Did the Senator notice what the Postmaster General said in connection with the rates on second-class matter? The Senator did not refer to it, and indicated that the Finance Committee had no advice in connection with the matter.

Mr. MOSES. Oh, no, Mr. President; I said that on page 10 Senators will find what the Postmaster General said; and he indicated that the maximum revenue would be $5,260,000.

Mr. COUZENS. But he recommended it.

Mr. MOSES. As a tentative proposal, according to the printed copy.

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; but he said that we could raise $5,000,000 by doing it.

Mr. MOSES. Yes; I said that.

Mr. COUZENS. I did not hear the Senator say it. The Senator said——

Mr. MOSES. That the maximum that we would get out of it was $5,000,000.

Mr. COUZENS. That is true; but the Senator did not state that the Postmaster General recommended it. I wanted the Senate to understand that the Finance Committee did not act without having what we considered an authoritative recommendation as to the action.

Mr. MOSES. I do not think the printed copy indicates that the Postmaster General recommended it, inasmuch as there is a printed subhead in small caps, as the printer would say, "Tentative proposals not included in the above."

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; but let me draw the Senator's attention to the testimony. I have before me the stenographic report. The pages may not agree with the pages of the printed copy the Senator has; but after discussing the second-class rates, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] asked the Postmaster General:

> What recommendation do you make as to the increase in the rates on second-class mail matter?
> Postmaster General BROWN. Well, we make no recommendation, Senator, as to action in a revenue bill. We think a 10 per cent increase would be justified.

I should like to know if that is not a recommendation.

Afterwards, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] said:

> How much revenue would it produce?
> Postmaster General BROWN. About $5,000,000.

So that while technically the Senator from New Hampshire may be correct, as the Senator says, the Postmaster General said, "We think a 10 per cent increase would be justified"; and I submit that that is a recommendation.

Mr. MOSES. I have not been able to find that in the printed copy, but I will look for it.

Mr. COUZENS. It is in the stenographic report from which I have just read.

Mr. MOSES. As the Senator well knows, many a stenographic transcript differs from the printed copy.

Mr. COUZENS. That was one reason why I was anxious to get the stenographic copy, to see that it was not changed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD], unless he withdraws it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. For the present I withdraw that amendment, so that the vote may be taken directly on the main proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question, then, is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL].

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that there is no objection to the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska. I desire to speak on the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I can not see any real, fundamental difference between this amendment and any other tax-increasing amendment that we put on this bill. It is not, perhaps, because we desire to increase this rate, although it is an open secret, as I understand, that under existing law the Post Office Department loses about $90,000,000 a year on account of carrying second-class mail matter for less than actual cost.

Now, when we are going to be compelled to get additional revenue and find some place where we can make the levy to produce that revenue, why is it not appropriate to increase the second-class rates, under which at the present time we are losing millions and millions of dollars? Even when this increase is made, if this amendment should be agreed to, we will still lose many millions of dollars in carrying second-class mail matter.

Why should not newspapers stand their proper share of these increased burdens that must rest heavily upon the shoulders of all classes? Why should we select them as a special class and give them tax-free opportunities that now cost the Government more than $90,000,000 more than the Government is getting out of them?

Mr. President, I notice that in the committee amendment the rate for the first and second zones is 2 cents. I will ask the Senator from Utah what is the rate now, and for the third zone?

The Senator from Utah tells me there is a 1-cent increase on each zone.

How much additional revenue is it estimated that these rates will produce?

Mr. SMOOT. Five million dollars.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. COPELAND. I find on page 3 of the hearings the following:

> Senator LA FOLLETTE. How much revenue would it produce?
> Postmaster General BROWN. About $2,500,000.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. NORRIS. They raised the rates higher than the Postmaster General suggested, as I understand.

Mr. COUZENS. No; the testimony that is on my desk is the stenographic report of the testimony, and that plainly says "$5,000,000." The testimony apparently was revised after the stenographic notes were sent to the Postmaster General, and the amount was changed from $5,000,000 to $2,500,000.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. This is the full reply:

> How much revenue would it produce?
> About $2,500,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Go on and read the next statement.

Mr. COPELAND (reading):

> The revenue act of 1917 made effective certain progressive increases in rates; and if those rates were effective now to their maximum limit in 1921, they would increase our revenues by about $5,000,000. That is, if that increase did not put the newspapers and magazines out of the mails.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, that is not what he testified to.

Mr. COPELAND. I only know what I have been handed by the Government.

Mr. COUZENS. I have the original transcript of the stenographic notes; and these figures were changed from the time the notes were taken before the committee.

Mr. COPELAND. I assume that the witness had the right to revise his testimony in order that it might conform to the facts, and I suppose that is what he did do.

Mr. COUZENS. I want to say that the Finance Committee acted upon the Postmaster General's testimony at the time, and did not wait for a printed copy of the testimony. The committee had a right to act upon the testimony that was delivered by the Postmaster General.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, even the stenographic report of his testimony made him make his statement in a conjectural sense, and not in a definite way.

Mr. COUZENS. That is true. That is what anybody must do with an estimate.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. President, I will proceed, if Senators are through. To my mind it is quite immaterial how much money this is going to raise; it is a very small part of the deficit that is caused by carrying second-class mail matter. That must be conceded by everybody.

Later on in this bill we are going to levy a tax of 2 cents upon the woman who has a cow, and sells the milk of the creamery, for every check that is drawn; and most of the checks will be less than a dollar. We have levied—and we have had to do it—heavy taxes upon all classes of business, upon all classes of our citizens; and nobody has been demanding that with stronger voice than the newspapers of our country. I say that without criticism. They were justified. They were calling attention to the necessity of the case. It was not what they wanted us to do, but what we must do; and the newspapers ought to stand their share of it.

Mr. President, I have for you an oasis in this desert. I am going to read a telegram from one newspaper in the United States at least that has been willing to apply to itself the same rule that it demanded we should apply to everybody else. I presume most of us have had hundreds and thousands of telegrams and letters from newspapermen saying "You must not increase our taxes," and the same newspapers have been demanding that taxes be increased all along the line, except that some of the big ones do not want the taxes increased on wealth, because some of them are extremely wealthy and have immense incomes, and they are opposed to the increase of the income tax. But out on the western plains, Mr. President, there is one newspaper that is willing to be treated like everybody else. It is the only one of its kind that I have heard of. Its telegram is the only one of its kind that has reached me, and I doubt whether any such telegram has reached any other Member of this body. They have all been the reverse. They have all been demanding that there should be no increased tax on second-class mail privileges—a bonus of more than $90,000,000 every year that the taxpayers of the United States are now paying, and have been paying for years. This amendment proposes that the bonus shall be cut down $5,000,000, or, if you want to have it that way, two and a half million dollars. I do not care which way you take it.

This telegram is from Lincoln, Nebr., and is directed to me:

> The all-important job is to balance the Budget. First-class mail can stand 3 cents postage. Newspapers must stand their share of increased taxes. If taxes on leased wires and news messages by telegraph and increased postage rates for newspapers are necessary to balance the Budget, we are for them. The Lincoln Star will support you in every effort you make to balance the Budget, leaving the spread of taxes to your best judgment.
> FRANK D. THROOP,
> Publisher of the Star.

Mr. President, I want to commend that sentiment to the United States Senate. I want to commend that to the weary Senators who for weeks have spent almost sleepless nights in trying to find some way to balance the Budget, to make our expenses and our income equal to each other, and have been doing it under an insistent and constant fire of telegrams and letters from all over the United States saying, in substance, "This industry can not have its taxes increased. You must pass the increase away from this to the other one." I mention this without criticism, because as a rule they all make out a good case; but if we listened to all of them, honestly made and backed up with logical arguments, there would not be a thing on earth to tax; and everybody knows that we must increase the taxes and cut down the expenses.

So I want to commend this telegram to the weary minds of Senators who have been trying to find some way to get out from under this burden with the least possible injury to anybody. I ask them to read this telegram, to view this one newspaper, at least, standing out like an oasis in the desert, admitting that the tax should be levied upon them the same as upon everybody else.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, there is one point that has been brought out this afternoon several times, the fact that an increase in second-class mail rates will have a tendency drive much of the present mail to other sources of transportation.

The Postmaster General stated before the Finance Committee that only about 17 per cent of the potential second-class mail is now carried by the Post Office Department.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Nevada a question.

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will not the Senator, who is chairman of the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, inform the Senate as to what class of mail is being carried at a deficit to the department?

Mr. ODDIE. Several classes; all but the first class.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Is the first class being carried at a deficit?

Mr. ODDIE. No.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Is the second class being carried at a deficit?

Mr. ODDIE. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Is the third class being carried at a deficit?

Mr. ODDIE. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. How about the fourth class?

Mr. ODDIE. There is a deficit in connection with that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I would like to call the attention of the Senate to another important fact, namely, that it is very difficult to realize whether the Post Office Department is paying or not, and how much the deficit really is, because while the Post Office Department charges itself with the rent it pays or with the money it pays out on its leases, it charges absolutely nothing for buildings owned, occupied, and maintained by the Federal Government in which post offices are located. I never could understand how the Post Office Department could claim that it was giving us reliable figures, when it does not take into consideration as one of the liabilities of the Postal Service the maintenance of buildings owned by the Government in which post offices are located. It does charge itself as one of its liabilities with the rents it pays, but not for maintaining buildings, because, they say, that is handled by the Treasury Department.

Mr. SMOOT. That is about $50,000,000 a year, for the Post Office Department.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. For maintenance of its buildings?

Mr. SMOOT. For maintenance of all the buildings.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. They do not take into consideration that $50,000,000. Is not that correct?

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Nevada yield to me?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. DILL. The Senator from Nevada stated that at the present time the Post Office is carrying only 17 per cent of what might be termed second-class mail, and that we are losing even on that 17 per cent. As I understand the Senator's argument, if we increase the rates we will carry still less of the mail that would come in the second class.

Mr. ODDIE. That is my contention.

Mr. DILL. But these rates being made higher would cause a smaller deficit. In other words, what does it profit the Post Office Department if it carries more second-class mail, if it continually loses money on what it does carry? Is it not better that we carry still less of it and get rid of this deficit in second-class mail than to go on carrying it and losing all the time on the balance we do carry?

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, that is a very large question, which has been raised before. The question of service should be considered. Certain very large publications get certain services, and can afford certain losses better than the small publications, which are equally dependent on the mail for service. The small publications will suffer more than the large ones, I contend, if this increase is made.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I think the statement just made by the Senator from Nevada is true, that the small publishers are the ones who will suffer.

The Postmaster General testified that only 17 per cent of the material which could be carried in the second class is now being carried by the Post Office Department, that 83 per cent of it is being carried by trucks and by other means than by the Post Office Department itself.

If we still further increase the second-class rate, there is no doubt but that the big publishers will find a way, by truck and otherwise, to carry their publications; but the small publisher is sure to suffer, because he is now dependent upon the mail, and will have to make use of it.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. Right at that point let me ask if this deficit is not created by the inequalities of the law which exempt the small publishers from the payment of any postage at all, not only small publishers but publishers of religious papers? Why should any religious paper, teaching a doctrine contrary to my belief, be carried through the mail at my expense? Agricultural journals also have a special privilege. I suspect that if we were to examine the whole problem with care, we would find that the daily newspapers are bearing the entire burden of this postal charge. No county paper is charged a thrip in the way of postage. Educational, religious, scientific, agricultural papers are given a special privilege, and I venture to say that that may account for the deficit altogether.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I have no doubt that has very much to do with it. But this matter of the second-class rate has been up time and time again. I find that in a hearing before the House Committee on Appropriations in October, 1930, the Postmaster General was asked the question then why we did not raise the second-class rates, and his reply was:

> Increasing the second-class rates will not increase revenue but will simply drive the business to other carriers that will carry it more cheaply than we will.

Mr. President, I want to say just one word more, and to call attention to this very interesting letter put into the RECORD by the Senator from Nevada, a letter from New York Typographical Union, No. 6, which summarizes the whole question better than any poor words of mine could do it. It is the expression of the union printers who are engaged in the publication of these various journals, magazines, and papers, and I think it is very appealing. They say:

> After a long period of inactivity toward the unemployed, Congress is considering at the present time an increase in second-class postal rates. This increase, if finally perpetrated by our lawmaking body, will throw out of work a large body of printers. The inconsistency of Congress in this regard is plainly shown when we submit in evidence the fact that Typographical Union No. 6, true to its age-old principles, has been fighting the battle to support its unemployed without Government or State aid. Figure, then, a government, while remaining apathetic toward the present depression and the unemployment caused thereby, actually considering means whereby it will add to the list of unemployed.
> Aside from selfish motives, it is my endeavor to point out to the reading public the broad ramifications caused by an increase in the second-class postal rates. Every government prides itself on a low percentage of illiterates. A low postal rate has been the means of keeping down the rate of illiterates in this country. Newspapers and periodicals turned out in the offices of metropolitan dailies and publication houses have found themselves, through the medium of the second-class postal rate, carried to the outposts of civilization and into the homes of those pioneers who have settled in the hamlets miles beyond schools or other places which disseminate learning. The newspaper and the magazine have been the schools and colleges for these pioneers. An increase in the second-class postal rate will have the effect of destroying these correspondence courses in art and literature. Can the Government afford to make such a grave mistake?
> Our own viewpoint as printers comes of the fact that many pieces of literature are distributed gratis throughout the Nation each year. There is poor incentive, then, for the advertiser who knows full well that the response is problematical, to add to his cost in attempting to broadcast his products to the far-off places where personal salesmanship is impossible.
> In this fact lies another damning point against the increase in second-class postal rates. Should advertising broadsides fail to reach into the nooks and crannies of civilization, there can be no demand for the products advertised. In this circumstance, every industry will be irretrievably damaged, and the return of prosperity in all lines delayed to that extent.

The letter is signed by the president of the typographical union. I am sure the statements set forth in it are facts. The amendment in reality means an attack upon the very culture of the Nation, and its welfare in other directions than those we commonly think of in connection with a bill relating to the economics of the Government.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. In regard to the claim that a saving can be made by publishers, the practice has grown up of publishers of periodicals transporting their publications from one zone to another by freight and by trucks. Is not that true?

Mr. COPELAND. That is true.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Let me ask the Senator from New York, or some other Senator who can give us the information, to what extent that practice has developed.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I may say that I have here a note which says that the development of the motor industry has so cheapened the delivery of goods that to-day newspapers are delivered in Detroit by truck from Chicago, and magazines are carted from Chicago to New York by trucks in competition with the mail and the railroads.

Of course, if we raise the rate materially, it will mean that still more will other means of transportation be used than the mails themselves.

Mr. President, I hope the amendment offered by the committee will be voted down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee, on page 310, after line 16.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is so much misunderstanding as to what we are voting on that I would like to have the Chair state the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment on which the Senate is about to vote.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 310, after line 16, the committee proposes to insert the following:

> (b) On and after July 1, 1932, and until July 1, 1934, on the advertising portion of any publication entered as second-class matter subject to the zone rates of postage under existing law, the rates per pound or fraction thereof for delivery within the eight postal zones established for fourth-class matter shall be as follows:
> For the first and second zones, 2 cents.
> For the third zone, 3 cents.
> For the fourth zone, 5 cents.
> For the fifth zone, 6 cents.
> For the sixth zone, 7 cents.
> For the seventh zone, 9 cents.
> For the eighth zone, and between the Philippine Islands and any portion of the United States, including the District of Columbia and the several Territories and possessions, 10 cents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BYRNES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr.

AUSTIN], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and vote "nay."

Mr. COHEN (when his name was called). Mr. President, I ask to be excused from voting on this question. I have a personal interest in the matter as a publisher of a newspaper.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia? The Chair hears none, and the Senator is excused from voting.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I can not obtain a transfer, and therefore I have to withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], who is detained on account of illness. I understand that if he were present he would vote "nay." If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DAVIS. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN]. I withhold my vote.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I take the liberty of withholding my vote, because I am a newspaper publisher and may be supposed to have a special interest in the question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana (after having voted in the affirmative). I am informed that the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. I have a general pair with that Senator, and in his absence, not knowing how he would vote, I am forced to withdraw my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] to the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. JONES. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] to the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE], who is present would vote as I shall vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY]; and

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG].

Mr. SHEPPARD. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] has a general pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK]. I am not advised how either Senator would vote if present.

The result was announced—yeas 43, nays 32, as follows:

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I gave notice before the vote that I would present separately the proposal contained in my original amendment. I now send the amendment to the desk in the form of an additional section and offer it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Alabama offers the following new section:

SEC. 1001½. The additional postal rates imposed on second-class matter by section 1001 shall not apply to newspapers, religious, agricultural, fraternal, and scientific publications.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, and the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] is in order at this time. It has been read. Is it the desire to have it again read?

SEVERAL SENATORS. No.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Nebraska if he will not consent to have the proposal contained in his amendment referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. I can assure him the committee will be called very promptly to consider it. It is a matter involving postal rates. I agree with the Senator that the present method is not right and that it should be corrected, but as a result of scientific investigation. His amendment provides for a scientific and technical study. There may be other ways of bringing it about which might change his amendment. I think time would be saved and I believe something important would be gained if he would allow his proposal to go to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, which is the proper place for it.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Utah will accept the amendment and let it go to conference.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to letting it go to conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah accepts the amendment. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to. The clerk will report the next amendment of the committee.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, under the heading "Title IX—Administrative and general provisions," on page 312, after line 16, to insert:

SEC. 1103. LIMITATIONS ON SUITS BY TAXPAYERS

(a) Section 3226 of the Revised Statutes, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3226. No suit or proceeding shall be maintained in any court for the recovery of any internal-revenue tax alleged to have been erroneously or illegally assessed or collected, or of any penalty claimed to have been collected without authority, or of any sum alleged to have been excessive or in any manner wrongfully collected until a claim for refund or credit has been duly filed with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, according to the provisions of law in that regard, and the regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury established in pursuance thereof; but such suit or proceeding may be maintained, whether or not such tax, penalty, or sum has been paid under protest or duress. No such suit or proceeding shall be begun before the expiration of six months from the date of filing such claim unless the commissioner renders a decision thereon within that time, nor after the expiration of two years from the date of mailing by registered mail by the commissioner to the taxpayer of a notice of the disallowance of the part of the claim to which such suit or proceeding relates."

(b) Suits or proceedings instituted before the date of the enactment of this act shall not be affected by the amendment made by subsection (a) of this section to section 3226 of the Revised Statutes. In the case of suits or proceedings instituted on or after the date of the enactment of this act where the part of the claim to which such suit or proceeding relates was disallowed before the date of the enactment of this act, the statute of limitations shall be the same as provided by such section 3226 before its amendment by subsection (a) of this section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 314, to insert:

SEC. 1104. DATE OF ALLOWANCE OF REFUND OR CREDIT

Where the commissioner has (before or after the enactment of this act) signed a schedule of overassessments in respect of any internal-revenue tax imposed by this act or any prior revenue act, the date on which he first signed such schedule (if after May 28, 1928) shall be considered as the date of allowance of refund or credit in respect of such tax.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 314, after line 7, to insert:

SEC. 1105. JEOPARDY ASSESSMENT

(a) If the commissioner finds that a person liable for tax (other than income tax) under any provision of the internal revenue laws designs quickly to depart from the United States or to remove his property therefrom, or to conceal himself or his property therein, or to do any other act tending to prejudice or to render wholly or partly ineffectual proceedings to collect such tax unless such proceedings be brought without delay, the commissioner shall cause notice of such finding to be given such person, together with a demand for an immediate return and immediate payment of such tax, and such tax shall thereupon become immediately due and payable.

(b) If such person (1) is not in default in making any return or paying any tax under the internal revenue laws, and (2) furnishes to the United States, under regulations to be prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary, security approved by the commissioner that he will duly return and pay the tax to which the commissioner's finding relates, then such tax shall not be payable prior to the time otherwise fixed for payment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask that the next amendment, relating to section 1106, refunds of miscellaneous taxes, may go over until to-morrow. There is a perfecting amendment necessary, which is not yet prepared, and which must be offered before the amendment itself is considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over. That completes the amendments in the regular order.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I move, on page 310, to strike out lines 9 to 16, inclusive, which relate to the increase of first-class postage from 2 cents to 3 cents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the amendment be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Nevada proposes to strike out, on page 310, lines 9 to 16, as follows:

(a) On and after the thirtieth day after the date of the enactment of this act and until July 1, 1934, the rate of postage on all mail matter of the first class (except postal cards and private mailing or post cards, and except other first-class matter on which the rate of postage under existing law is 1 cent for each ounce or fraction thereof) shall be 1 cent for each ounce or fraction thereof in addition to the rate provided by existing law.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Nevada.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah asks, as I understand it, that section 1106 go over?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have an amendment which was printed yesterday and is now on the table. I think it properly belongs in connection with that section or immediately following it.

Mr. SMOOT. It applies to the section which I have asked may go over.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then it may go over and I shall present it in connection with that section when the Senator from Utah brings it before the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, until what time is the section to go over?

Mr. SMOOT. Until to-morrow. We are merely preparing a perfecting amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that that completes the bill except the amendments which have been passed over.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the Senator from Utah that we passed over the item relating to the tax on checks. Can we not take that up now and have it disposed of?

Mr. SMOOT. It would be just as well to take up the check item now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be reported.

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment is in section 741, page 285.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 285, after line 19, the Committee on Finance proposes to insert:

PART V—TAX ON CHECKS, ETC.

SEC. 741. TAX ON CHECKS, ETC.

(a) There is hereby imposed a tax of 2 cents upon each of the following instruments, made or drawn on or after the 15th day after the date of the enactment of this act and before July 1, 1934: Checks, drafts, or orders for the payment of money, drawn upon any bank, banker, or trust company; such tax to be paid by the maker or drawer.

(b) Every person paying any of the instruments mentioned in subsection (a) as drawee of such instrument shall collect the amount of the tax imposed under such subsection by charging such amount against any deposits to the credit of the maker or drawer of such instrument, and shall on or before the last day of each month make a return, under oath, for the preceding month, and pay such taxes to the collector of the district in which his principal place of business is located, or if he has no principal place of business in the United States, to the collector at Baltimore, Md. Such returns shall contain such information and be made in such manner as the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may by regulations prescribe. Every person required to collect any tax under this section is hereby indemnified against the claims and demands of any person for the amount of any payments made in accordance with the provisions of this section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska to the committee amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 286, line 2, after the word "company," it is proposed to insert a comma and the words "for an amount in excess of $5."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska to the committee amendment.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, there are 1,500,000 farmers who are selling cream from day to day, and there are 900,000 farmers who are shipping milk to the various towns and cities. Not only is the dairy industry affected by the pending tax proposal but also the poultry industry; and those two industries together produce one-third of the farm income. This 2-cent tax upon checks will seriously affect the dairy industry because of the fact that such farm products are paid for in small amounts. It was testified before the committee that the average dairy check was $2.15. I have a report from the leading bank in Omaha which indicates that for the day on which they reported—which, as I remember, was May 9—there were some 2,200 items in the form of creamery checks; that they averaged $2.40 for that day. The Farmers' Union Creamery, of Superior, Nebr., one of the small towns in southern Nebraska, issued 750,000 checks of this character during 1931; and if this 2-cent tax had been applied the creamery, which is a union creamery, would have had to have borne a tax of $15,000 on account of the business it does in that part of the State. The Fairmont Creamery Co.'s headquarters are in Omaha, and last year they issued some 6,500,000 checks that averaged about $2.

The profits in the dairy industry are now very small. For April a report was made by the Dairy Herd Improvement Association of Nebraska. The association reported on 5,086 cows selected and culled, and their average production was less than 1 pound of butterfat per day. That butterfat sold at an average of 15 cents a pound; the cost of production was 14 cents a pound, at least; and when I say it was 14 cents per pound, consider the farmer's investment in the cow, which is depreciating; consider that he must feed it; that he must care for it; that he must milk it twice a day; and certainly 14 cents as the cost of all that is not an excessive estimate. The consequence was, as stated by the farm dairy representative in Douglas County, that the average profit to those farmers per cow per day was 1 cent.

Consider a farmer with a herd of eight cows. His gross income per day from his investment, for depreciation, for feed, for care, for milking, was $1.20 for eight cows; his profit per day on his butterfat per cow was 1 cent; and all he had left was his skimmed milk; and Senators can imagine what that is worth when to-day hogs are selling for from two dollars and a half to three dollars and a half per hundred pounds.

Mr. President, applying this tax in the case of the various farmers owning this selected herd of 5,086 cows, we find that it will mean that from 12½ to 13 per cent of their profits would have been taken last April to pay this proposed stamp tax had it been in effect. In view of this fact, Mr. President, in view of the condition of agriculture which is now the lowest of any industry on the economic scale, should we not exclude checks for $5 and less so that this tax may not be passed on to the farmer, which it surely will be if enacted?

Consider the case of the Fairmont Creamery Co. of Omaha. They issued 6,500,000 checks last year. A tax on those checks as proposed would have cost the company $130,000, and, of course, the creamery company would have passed that cost on to the farmer. There can be no question as to that.

As a matter of fact, many creameries are now in a position to do so because the farmer delivers his cream and obtains a form of order which he takes to the bank and cashes. When he would do that, under this amendment, if adopted as proposed, he would have to put a 2-cent stamp on the order.

It can easily be imagined that all creameries will adopt this plan and farmers will pay the tax indeed.

Mr. President, we must do something for agriculture. We must make some exception in a case of this kind.

As to the reduction which the adoption of the amendment I have proposed would cause in the income to be derived from the tax as reported by the committee: The Secretary of the Treasury estimated that the income to the Government would be about $95,000,000; the lowest estimate made before the committee was about $25,000,000, and the average of these two estimates is about $60,000,000. Assume, Mr. President, that the estimate of $95,000,000 is correct, how much would the revenue be decreased by the adoption of the amendment I have proposed? In order to have some measure to determine what the reduction in revenue would be, I asked the leading bank in Omaha to give me a report as to what percentage checks of $5 or less constituted the total of checks handled in one day.

On the day the count was made they handled in the neighborhood of 25,000 checks, and the report showed that 27.3 per cent were for $5 or less. So, Mr. President, there will be a reduction in the income to be derived from this item, if that income is assumed to be $95,000,000, of a sum in the neighborhood of $25,000,000. On the other hand, if the estimate of $60,000,000 is correct, the reduction by the adoption of my amendment would be in the neighborhood of some $16,000,000.

Mr. President, I feel that whenever a Senator offers an amendment that may reduce the revenue to be derived from any taxes he ought to submit some plan for recouping the bill in that amount. I have such a proposal. An amendment is now pending to tax the gross income of operating power companies throughout the country 3 per cent. Mr. President, here is one industry in this country that has not felt the pinch of the depression. Assuming the income of the operating power companies in 1929 to be 100, the gross income of the companies in 1930, as reported by the American Electric Light Association, was 102.7 and in 1931 was 101½.

Here is a highly prosperous industry, even in these hard times. Last year they had more income than they had in the boom year of 1929. Here is an industry that could respond to additional taxation without injury or hardship. We could tax this industry sufficiently to make up the loss resulting from eliminating checks of $5 and less. It will amount to little to this industry, practically speaking; but what will a 2-cent tax on checks mean in the case of the farmer? Pennies now mean to him what they have never meant before. In an industry where two wagonloads of products must be delivered now to buy that which could have been purchased prior to the war with one wagonload, every penny must be considered; and when we recall the report of the Dairy Herd Improvement Association on selected dairy cattle for April of this year, and remember that the profit per cow was but one cent a day, how can we add this tax upon an industry reduced to such profits?

Mr. President, we must do something for agriculture. Agriculture must be rescued.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, for a great many years, up until recently, the banks of the country had advertised in the newspapers advising people to keep their savings in the banks, to pay their bills with checks, and thus help business generally and keep more money in circulation, instead of having it in pockets and in drawers in the various homes of the country. The wives particularly were asked, instead of paying with cash the grocery bill or the weekly expense accounts of running the home, to keep the money in the bank and pay these bills with checks, all redounding to the benefit of the community and the country at large, keeping in the aggregate large amounts of money in the banks, and, through the banks, in circulation.

Now we propose to levy a tax upon these homes—which have been paying their bills weekly or monthly, as the case may be, by check—by levying a tax upon checks, thus adding to the burdens of those who are already overburdened. So the effect of this tax, in my judgment, will be now, when we can least stand it, to drive, in the aggregate, millions of money out of the banks. Housewives and other people will carry the money in their pockets, and pay their bills in cash rather than by checks.

Mr. President, it is an unjustifiable tax. John D. Rockefeller, who draws his check for $5,000,000, must pay 2 cents, and the poor woman who has milked a cow and has taken the cream to the creamery and gets 40 cents for it and is paid for it in a check must pay 2 cents on her check. It makes no difference what the amount is; 2 cents in the way of a stamp must be attached to every check. We are penalizing doing business with banks at a time when the cry all over the United States has been, "Stop withdrawing your money from banks!"

The slogan hurled into the face and the ears of every citizen of the United States over the radio, from the stump, and through the newspapers, has been, "Do not draw your money out of the bank. Stop keeping your money in stockings. Let it remain in the bank. Have confidence! Have faith!" And now we propose to tax everybody who has that faith by levying a stamp tax on checks!

We have spent many dollars of Federal funds in trying to help the farmers who produce the food we consume to organize themselves into cooperative organizations, in order that the producers may get as nearly as possible the full benefit of the dollar that the consumer must pay for food products. All over the land, in answer to the sentiment, in answer to the call, cooperative organizations of farmers have sprung into existence. Now we propose to levy upon them a tax greater than almost any other tax in this bill in proportion to the amount of money upon which the tax is levied.

These cooperative organizations, which we all want to see successful, almost universally pay by check for the products delivered to them by their members. We would not want them to pay for the products in any other way. In the aggregate, millions upon millions of dollars are kept in the banks by this method of doing business, paid for in checks—almost universally small checks. I am going to give you illustrations of some of them.

First, I have here a telegram sent by the head of the Farmers' Union in the State of Nebraska, in which he says:

> It would cost the Superior Farmers' Union Creamery alone $6,000 for four months this year on checks under $10.

One creamery pays $6,000 in four months in the way of these stamps on checks. Remember, that can not be passed on. There is no such thing as passing it on. This is a cooperative institution, the profits of which go to the producers. These are the producers that everybody is anxious to help, because they are suffering more than anybody else from this depression. All the expense of the operation of such an association goes directly to and is paid for 100 per cent by the membership, because all the money that is not expended for expense of operation goes to the people who produce the product. So that this organization alone would pay, its head says, in this stamp tax $6,000 for four months' operation. That would be $18,000 in a year deducted from the profits of that cooperative institution, taken out of the pockets of the men and the women who are milking cows, taking care of chickens, delivering eggs for 10 and 5 and 6 cents a dozen, I understand, now, and receiving from 12 to 15 cents a pound for butter. We are going to levy this tax upon them. We are going to put this burden upon their shoulders.

It is inexcusable, Mr. President. It is indefensible.

Here is a telegram from Missouri, signed by William Hirth, president of the Missouri Farmers' Association. He says:

Proposed check tax will place extremely heavy and unfair burden on Missouri Farmers' Association, which operates—

Now, listen—

700 cooperative agencies—

That is in the State of Missouri alone—and does annual business in excess of $100,000,000—

That is in the State of Missouri—and this burden will fall almost wholly on farmers of Missouri. Under no circumstances should tax be applied to checks of $10 or less, and $20 would be preferable. We do not object to reasonable increased taxes; but the farmers of the United States are largely paid in small checks for poultry and dairy products, and they, therefore, will bear brunt of this proposal, and Heaven knows they already have burdens enough.

That is from the president of the Missouri Farmers' Association.

I have here a letter from the Farmers' Union Cooperative Creamery, operating at Superior, Aurora, Norfolk, and Fremont, Nebr., signed by the general manager of that association. He says:

I have been informed that the Finance Committee of the Senate has reversed itself in eliminating the tax exemption on checks of $5 or less, as was originally proposed.

I want to give you a picture of how unfair this tax is to the cream and poultry producers of the Middle West, and possibly it will affect the farmers the same way on many other commodities.

Our creamery, during the four months of 1932, bought approximately 3,000,000 pounds of butterfat. The average delivery of cream is 10 pounds of butterfat. In other words, we issued over 300,000 checks. Therefore this tax would have cost our farmers, during the first four months of the year, about $6,000. The same condition applies to the farmers who sell poultry and eggs.

To make it more specific, our farmers deliver their cream approximately three times each week. If a farmer brought 10 pounds of butterfat each delivery, and a tax of 2 cents per check was charged, the tax would be $3.12 for each individual farmer each year.

The price of butterfat at the present time is about 15 cents per pound—

And so on.

Mr. President, can anyone for a moment claim that such a tax under any circumstances is justified? The inequality, the unfairness, and the burden that we place upon those who are burdened most are indefensible.

I have here a letter from the president of the Farmers' Educational Cooperative State Union of Nebraska. He had read about something I said in the Senate the other night about putting a tax of $1 a head on hogs, and raising a lot of revenue, and he takes me to task in this letter for that, in a good-natured way. He says:

I also enjoyed your remarks that Congress should not longer overlook the possibility of taxing hogs, and they want to do it quickly, because farmers will turn them over for the tax pretty soon. To-day it looks as if the top on the Omaha market would be 3 cents. (This is choice shipping hogs.) The bulk is selling from $2.65 to $2.95.

A friend of mine of Bird City, Kans., hauled two truckloads of hogs to Bird City last Saturday, and was just able to sell one truckload, and had to take the other load back home.

Mr. Joe Swanson, a substantial farmer of Custer County, was in last night with cattle. He related that a neighbor of his hauled a truckload of hogs to Mason City, Nebr., this week, and that there were several 125-pound shotes in the load which the buyer would not take. He offered them for 50 cents apiece and finally had to take them back home. Another incident—one of his neighbors took two hogs to town, weighing 125 pounds apiece, 250 pounds for the two, and he received $2.50 for them. You have started hog talk in the Senate, but I could go on relating incidents of this kind almost by the hundreds that I know of.

Mr. President, are these the people whose checks we are asked to tax 2 cents apiece? Are these the people we are asked to put this burden upon in order that we may balance the Budget? We are not justified from any viewpoint in going to the limit in overburdening these people, who are already producing the food of our Nation at a financial loss to themselves.

Here is a letter from the Farmers Equity Cooperative Creamery Co., of Orleans, Nebr. That town is right next to the Kansas line. I want to say to my friend the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER]: A large portion of the members of this cooperative organization live in Kansas. That organization is—and it says so on its letterhead—the largest cooperative creamery in the world. What do they say? What is their experience?

Mr. President, they have buying stations all over northwestern Kansas and southwestern Nebraska for 125, and I think perhaps 150 miles west, northwest, and southwest of Orleans, the place where the headquarters are located. These buying stations buy cream of the farmers who comprise the association. It is purely cooperative. There is no profit in it anywhere to anybody. They have to pay the expense of operation, and then make butter which sells for the highest and top price in the city of New York and in other cities all over the East and in the middle portion of our country. These buying stations take from the members their cream and give them checks, when they do, for the butterfat that is in the cream. That cream is shipped to the headquarters at Orleans, a small town of about 1,500 or 2,000 people. There it is manufactured into butter and sent all over the United States, commanding, as I have said, the highest price. All the profit in it comes back to the men and the women on the farm who milk the cows and send in the cream from the collecting stations.

I want Senators to listen to this man's letter, or at least a part of it. He says:

At the present moment, with cream prices ranging from 10 cents to 12 cents per pound butterfat—

Let me stop there, Senators. Think of that, 10 to 12 cents a pound for butterfat! That is what they are getting out on the farm, out in the country. That is what the cooperative is paying. These farmers at the end of the season will get a little more, because so far they have always made a profit, and the profit at the end of the season will go back to them.

They have organized that cooperative creamery, as this man says, the largest in the world, and they have operated it, because we have encouraged them. Our Federal Government has encouraged that. This very creamery company has borrowed money under the marketing act, which we passed, providing for the lending of money to cooperative organizations. They are paying interest now to the Federal Government on borrowed money upon which they operate.

There is no middleman here, no man getting a return on stocks or bonds. All the profit goes to the members of the association, scattered over a territory 100 miles by 150 miles. Yet this cream comes in in small amounts. Especially in warm weather they encourage the members to bring the cream to the delivering station as often as possible, every day if they can, because they get better results. They are not equipped, out on the prairies in their homes, many of them in sod homes, with refrigeration and other modern means of keeping their cream and butter. So the association encourages the farmers to bring the cream in every day if they can. This man says:

At the present moment with cream prices ranging from 10 cents to 12 cents per pound butterfat in this territory, there are very few checks that are issued for cream that amount to $1 or more. With the farmers bringing in cream in very small amounts a 2-cent stamp tax on checks issued for cream would be a very exorbitant and excessive charge on the checks. I am inclosing herewith a copy of a report taken at random from one of our cream stations, which will give you some idea of the amounts that are paid for cream deliveries at the stations. A 2-cent tax on checks from 50 cents up to $1 would be practically a 4 per cent charge. * * *.

In conjunction with other creameries in this territory we have been making a determined effort to buy cream on a graded basis and have tried to educate the farmer to bring in his cream at frequent intervals in order to get a better grade of cream; but if a tax were to be charged on these cream checks, this would have a tendency to discourage bringing in of small amounts of cream frequently. It is to the best interests of the creamery that the patrons bring in their cream as often as possible, especially in warm weather.

The subject in question involves the expenditure of many thousands of dollars, which expenditure will, of course, revert back to the cream producers themselves.

I have not read all of the letter, Mr. President, because I want to hurry along, but it will be noted that I did read that he said that he inclosed a daily report from one of the buying stations of this creamery. This happens to come from a town with which I am very familiar. I know where it is located, I know the country that surrounds it, and the men and the women who make up the inhabitants of that community. Here it is, not a copy, but the original, the daily report.

Every one of these buying stations sends in to the Orleans office, the headquarters of this cooperative institution, a daily report showing just exactly what they did that day, and if any Senator will examine this, he can see almost at a glance the amount of cream that was bought and the price paid, and from whom it was bought, on a particular day.

This report happens to be for the 30th day of April, 1932. It is from Imperial, Nebr. As the writer said, they have tried to educate the farmers to bring in their cream as often as possible.

On that day 17 members of that association delivered cream to the particular receiving station referred to, and here is the name of every one of them.

There is a column showing the number of pounds of butterfat that each one brought in that day.

There is a column showing the test, to show just how rich the cream was in butterfat. There is a column showing the price paid. There is a column showing the amount of each individual sale. There is a column showing the number of the check in payment. There is a complete report of everything. It is interesting to examine it.

The first one on the list was L. H. Seward, who had 13 pounds of cream. The test was 33. There were 4.3 pounds of butterfat. The average price of all the sales was 12 cents that day, and the amount of this man's check was the great sum of 52 cents.

Picture in your mind what that means, and then multiply it by thousands. This farmer lives out in the country, and on account of the high price of lumber—and you have made it higher—he is probably compelled to live in a sod house, with a sod barn. He went to town with his butterfat and got 52 cents for it; and you are proposing to charge him 2 cents on the check he received. You say that is not much. True, it is not; but 2 cents amounts to something with a man who will bring from his home in the country, 5 to 10 miles away, a little bit of butterfat and sell it for 52 cents. It means something to him. It is a big percentage on his business, more than you charge John D. Rockefeller, or any other man like him.

I could read every man's name. The next man went away with a check for 65 cents. Listen to the next one. I do not know how many miles this man's home was from town, but his name was Fitzpatrick. He had 3.3 pounds of butter. He got a check for 40 cents. Think how he must have felt. Think how proud he must have been when he went back home with a check for 40 cents in his pocket. How happy he will be if we tax him 2 cents on that check.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, does the Senator know that that man is paying a tax equal to 5 per cent upon the production of his dairy?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. We do not tax anybody else that high on his business. This man had 3.3 pounds of butter and got a check for 40 cents. Here was another man by the same name, Fitzpatrick. Perhaps he is a brother of the other man. One is named George and the other Ray. When George went home he had 56 cents with him. He took 56 cents in the form of a check when he went home. I might go on down through the list. In all the 17 the largest check of all was $1.82. That man's name was Brewer. What a rich man he must be.

Mr. HAWES. That was the joint production of the cow, the man's wife, and himself, and possibly a mileage of some six miles, and he got $1.86.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, no, not $1.86; only $1.82.

Mr. HAWES. Oh! And now it is proposed to charge him 2 cents on the product of the cow, the man himself, and his wife.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. I am not going to read all of these names, but I will give the amounts. The last man I was talking about was George Fitzpatrick. The next man got 82 cents. The next one got 32 cents. Think of the toil and the work and the labor, and yet we propose to tax this man in the neighborhood of 6 per cent on his business. The next man got 60 cents. The next one was a very wealthy man, a man of great wealth. He got $1.01 for his butter. The next one got 76 cents. The next one beat him a little and got 79 cents. The next one went higher and got $1.19. The next one was $1.33. We are getting up among the rich people now. We are considering the rich farmers now.

Mr. HAWES. That must be in Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes, it is. Here is another rich fellow. He got $1.13. Think of that man's farm and how quickly he will be in the banking business. How long will it take that man, getting this enormous sum for his butterfat, to retire to the city?

Mr. BORAH. He will retire pretty quickly.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but not to the city. He will probably retire before he gets to the city. That rich one had $1.33. The next man was not quite as rich. He only got $1.13 that day. The next one was the wealthiest man of all. Of all the 17 farmers living in luxury this was the topmost of all. He brought his butterfat, his cream, in from the country and delivered it and he went home with a check for $1.82. Oh, how we envy that man's luxury. The next fellow only got 66 cents, the next one $1.32, and the last poor fellow that day who brought in his cream got 54 cents.

These are actual figures. These are actual happenings. There is nothing fantastic about this. This is the cold, cold truth. This reminds me of what the man said about hogs. We were talking about taking hogs to market and selling them for 50 cents apiece, and some one said, why not feed this milk to the hogs? That can not be done, because it is worse yet as to hogs. After this man raised his hogs, he took them to market. He said they were shoats. I suppose most Senators know what shoats are. The Vice President knows, I am sure. It is perfectly plain what we mean when we say he took a shoat to town that weighed 125 pounds and could not sell it and had to take it home again. Another fellow took two and sold them for 50 cents apiece. How much sweat and toil and labor and sacrifice did that mean?

Yet it is proposed, or at least hoped, that these men shall be happy and go out and shout and whoop it up for somebody in this campaign. Does anyone think, when they have to go through all this and keep it up day after day, that they are going to be able to keep up the fight much longer? The farmer is taxed on his gasoline; he is taxed on his Ford car. Now it is proposed to levy a tax upon his creamery business amounting in some instances to more than 6 per cent of the business that he does. How long will that last? How long will a suffering people stand that kind of persecution, that kind of treatment, that kind of cruelty, to be singled out by the great Government of the United States for such additional taxation? Mr. President, I say it is indefensible. It is a moral sin. We can not afford to do it. If the Budget can not be balanced without levying this tax upon these unfortunate people, then let the Budget go unbalanced!

THE COOPERATIVES AND THE CHICAGO BOARD OF TRADE

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Nebraska has brought to the attention of the Senate, so ably and so forcefully, the true condition of agriculture in the Kansas-Nebraska region. The facts as stated by him have not been exaggerated in the least. The conditions are most deplorable. The situation is growing worse. I say there will be no end to this depression, no return to prosperity, until the farmer receives a fair price for his product. He can not go on longer under present distressing conditions. Whenever prices of farm products come back to normal, business will revive, factories will resume operations, and the millions of unemployed will return to work.

Mr. President, I am glad to support the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] as to the tax on bank checks and incidentally, too, I am pleased to commend his courageous stand and his persistent demand for a legislative program that will be of assistance to agriculture.

I am receiving, as the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is receiving, protests from farm organizations in Kansas against the proposed bank-check tax. I have here a letter from Ralph Snyder, president of the Kansas State Farm Bureau, appealing to me to do everything I can to eliminate the proposed tax because of the added burden it will place upon the farmer. I have here a letter from J. C. Mohler, secretary of the Kansas State Board of Agriculture, a prominent farm leader in my State for the last 25 years, who writes as follows:

KANSAS STATE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE,
Topeka, May 25, 1932.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: A tax on checks in small amounts will very seriously hurt the dairy industry, in our opinion. For example, we have about 3,000 cream-buying stations in Kansas, and each of these stations writes quite a number of checks daily in payment for butterfat. These are all small checks, and if each had to stand a tax of 2 cents, it would be prohibitive. The present method of paying these small amounts by check is the most convenient that could be devised, and the producer gets his money at once, which is considerable of an item nowadays. The margin on handling butterfat at the cream-buying stations is very narrow at present. If a 2-cent tax is imposed on these small checks, it would almost drive the industry to some other method that would not be nearly so convenient or satisfactory and might mean payment to producers at intervals, say, semimonthly instead of at time of delivery, as is now done.

Very truly yours,

J. C. MOHLER,
Secretary Kansas State Board of Agriculture.

Then I have a letter from R. I. Austin, head of the Concordia Creamery Association, reading as follows:

CONCORDIA, KANS., May 14, 1932.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CAPPER: Since the big wheat crash in prices has virtually eliminated that commodity in the paying end of a farmer's business of running a farm, he has been forced once again to rely solely upon the checks he receives for the cream, poultry, and eggs he brings to town. These are about all the material he has left to use in his ever-increasing battle for livelihood, in his struggle for an existence.

And, as if the dwindling market prices for these were not enough, forces are at work in the Government to add another burden in the proposed tax of 2 cents on each poultry, egg, and cream check he receives. It does not matter that the operation of the law is apparently so fashioned that it makes it appear to transfer the actual charge to the buyer; nevertheless, the truth of the matter is it is the producer who must bear the burden, since the price he gets is unavoidably based upon what is left after transportation, manufacturing, selling, overhead, and buying costs are deducted from the amounts received for the finished product in the consuming markets. The 2-cent tax is an item that can not be removed from buying costs and must be taken into account in determining what the farmer shall receive. It can not be charged to profits, for, with the almost daily decline of prices and no prospect of any early improvement, there simply are no profits to absorb the tax.

A 2-cent tax on a cream or egg check would not seem so high if the check were an amount reaching as high as $25, but such drafts are now almost entirely unknown to the farmer. Even though he delivers on the average about the same amount of produce as formerly, the prevailing consuming market is so low that the total amount of his check ordinarily runs far more often in the neighborhood of $2 or less on each case of eggs or batch of cream that he leaves at the store or produce house. Moreover, since the tax is based on number instead of value, the rate of percentage cost applying on checks of $2 is 1 per cent; $1, 2 per cent; and 50 cents, 4 per cent. Calculated in this manner, one is actually amazed at the excessive cost this entails and which must be borne by the producer in marketing these home-saving sources of income.

The farmer reads the daily paper and finds little, if anything, accomplished to reduce governmental expenditures, and then to be faced with all kinds of schemes and devices to saddle additional and unwarranted tax burdens onto him and his industry is nothing short of an abominable outrage.

I would be pleased to have you read this letter as my protest for them and the whole agricultural industry. I trust that you will give it earnest consideration and will lend your efforts to prevent the enactment of this hideous tax measure (so written as to adroitly conceal from the producer its real, sinister purpose, but victimizing him nevertheless) upon the farmers in Kansas and elsewhere.

Very truly yours,

THE CONCORDIA CREAMERY CO.,
R. I. AUSTIN,
Cream Department.

Mr. President, I wish to send to the desk and ask to have read a telegram from C. E. Huff, of the Nation-wide Cooperative Sales Agency, the Farmers National Grain Corporation, as to the effort that is now being made to crush the cooperative movement in its activities on the Chicago Board of Trade. Before I sent the telegram forward to be read, I want to comment just a moment on the contents of the telegram.

Mr. President, the recent action of the subsidiary corporation of the Chicago Board of Trade in attempting to hamstring the farm cooperatives is such a flagrant case of injustice that the attention of the Senate, and of the country, should be called to the matter.

I am not going to take much time. I am not going to mince words. Several years ago the Congress enacted the grain futures act. One of the provisions of this act is that cooperative organizations must be permitted to hold memberships in boards of trade and be accorded all privileges of membership.

Now, as I understand the situation, members of the Chicago Board of Trade can deal in cash wheat on the floor. The membership held by the Farmers National Grain Corporation entitles it to that privilege. But it seems there is a sort of inner circle to the Chicago Board of Trade, a subsidiary of the board, known as the Chicago Board of Trade Clearing Corporation. All deals in futures, including hedges as well as speculative transactions, must be cleared through this clearing corporation. The commission charged is one-eighth of a cent per bushel.

Immediately after the agricultural marketing act was passed, and before the Farmers National Grain Corporation was in position to start trading operations, the clearing corporation adopted a rule that thereafter no corporation could become a member. That rule, Mr. President, absolutely bars all cooperative associations from membership on the clearing corporation; it means that cooperatives are not entitled to all the privileges of other members of the Chicago Board of Trade; it means the cooperatives must pay commissions on all their transactions cleared through the clearing corporation, and all their futures transactions must be cleared through that corporation.

Of course, that rule was adopted to head off the biggest cooperative of them all, the Farmers National Grain Corporation. That was its purpose. It meant that the Farmers National must pay around a hundred thousand dollars a year extra commissions to members of the clearing corporation, clearly a violation of the spirit, and I believe the letter, of the grain futures act.

The Farmers National Grain Corporation then did a very natural, perfectly legal, and perfectly proper thing under the circumstances. It bought the stock of the Updike Grain Co., already a member of the clearing corporation when the restrictive ruling was adopted. The officers of this company were retained, and it cleared the transactions of the Farmers National Grain Corporation.

Now, the clearing corporation has suspended the Updike Grain Co., charging all sorts of bad faith, breaking of regulations, breaches of ethics, moral turpitude, mayhem, and arson against the Farmers National Grain Corporation for owning the stock of the Updike Grain Co.

I understand the Secretary of Agriculture is planning to test the law in the case and see whether or not the Farmers National can legally be barred from the clearing corporation. He believes he will win the case.

But the legal proceedings probably will be long drawn out. Meantime the Farmers National is being discriminated against, being compelled to pay scores of thousands of dollars extra commissions which other members of the board of trade who also hold memberships in the clearing corporation are not compelled to pay.

Mr. President, I say the Chicago Board of Trade has dealt an unfair blow at the cooperatives. It is pursuing its policy of ruining these cooperatives and is spreading propaganda all over the country which would lead the unthinking to believe the board of trade had caught the Farmers National doing a crooked thing, which is not true, in my judgment.

Mr. President, it is my belief that when these facts are properly presented and understood the Congress will take action to protect the cooperatives against such discrimination. I am not fully acquainted with the facts; neither is the Senate. I believe we should have all the facts and have them immediately.

In order that the facts may be fully developed, Mr. President, I ask that the telegram from Mr. C. E. Huff, president of the Farmers National Grain Corporation, which I send to the desk and desire to have printed in the RECORD, may be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I hope that committee will make a thorough investigation at an early date and report such legislation as may be necessary to protect the rights of the cooperatives against the discriminatory and unfair business tactics of the Chicago Board of Trade, if such legislation, in the judgment of the committee, shall be needed.

There being no objection, the telegram was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., May 26, 1932.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
Senate Office Building, Washington:

Farmers' National Grain Corporation, nation-wide cooperative sales agency, was incorporated fall 1929 and secured membership privileges of Chicago Board of Trade May 1, 1930. Clearing-house privileges being additionally necessary for full effective operations, application for such privileges was filed in June, 1930. Clearing corporation declined membership, pointing out rule excluding corporations from clearing privileges unless members prior April 2, 1929. January, 1931, Farmers' National purchased stock of Updike Grain Co., for several years member of clearing association, and continued operations and management as before. This action was to avoid delay in getting clearing-house membership, which was absolutely essential to operations. Fred Thatcher, president, and Florentine, secretary, were continued exactly as before, and stock certificates theretofore held by them were indorsed in blank but not transferred of record. Board of trade charged these men with false affidavits regarding ownership of stock. Such charges were inaccurate. June, 1931, Updike company filled out customary questionnaire covering stock holdings, which report stated facts exactly as revealed by stock-record book and showed Farmers' National as majority stockholder and Huff and Milnor with one share each. Questionnaire did not deal with ownership but with stock held, which distinction well-nigh universal among corporations whose stock holdings are necessarily in names of individuals in order that they may be qualified as directors or officers. This practice recognized everywhere as legal and necessary. Neither these men nor Farmers' National were under obligation either legal or moral to further reveal relationship between Updike and Farmers' National. July, 1931, board of trade committee made inquiry of these men as to ownership of stock and they clearly stated such ownership rested with Farmers' National. Such committee report was presented to board of directors of board of trade and ordered filed without action. December, 1931, second questionnaire was filled out by Updike in same form and manner as in June, and board of trade now charges false affidavits in connection this statement, even though full information was in hands board of trade and public statement had been made in July, 1931, by Milnor regarding Farmers' National ownership of Updike. Such charges flimsy and manifestly discriminate against cooperatives, since similar stock-holding practice obtains in most instances where stock ownership is by corporation. Fact that no steps were taken by board of trade for nearly year after full knowledge in their possession indicates no belief that wrongdoing existed was then in their minds.

Florentine acted as broker for Updike and others and retained all brokerage earned, as he apparently was required to do by rules of board of trade. Florentine held one share of stock in his name and acted as secretary of Updike Co. without salary. He had acted in this capacity and handled brokerage in this manner without salary continuously since 1925. No change whatever was made in activities after time Farmers' National purchased Updike. This practice had apparent approval of board of trade while Updike was privately owned, but became violation of rules when Updike was purchased by cooperatives. Florentine and Farmers' National still believe such practice in exact conformity with board of trade rules, and that this viewpoint was fully sustained in evidence and citations offered in hearings, which were apparently ignored by board of trade directors in reaching their decision against Updike. Another charge was that Updike violated rules by permitting parent company—Farmers' National—use of its private wire system. Trade practice permits use of private wires in connection with any probable business from which the company operating wires may benefit in future. In view of fact that company operating wires was completely owned by subsidiary—Farmers' National—there was no deception in this practice and no financial gain or loss. Farmers' National always willing to take over operation wire system, or if board of trade desired would pay Updike for such service, which in effect transfers money from one pocket to other, since Updike wholly owned by Farmers' National. M. W. Thatcher will inform you fully regarding current application Farmers' National for clearing privileges in own name which after Updike suspension if further denied will cost organized grain producers scores of thousands of dollars. No wrongdoing by cooperatives or their representatives has occurred, and impartial review of evidence offered by board of trade and Farmers' National will conclusively show effort to discriminate against cooperatives. Possibly matter best expressed by newspaper headline Chicago to-day reading, "Board of Trade Defies Hyde by Expelling Firm." Will appreciate every effort you make in behalf cooperative movement at this critical time. We hold that rule excluding corporations from clearing membership privileges is violation grain futures act and clearly discriminates against cooperatives, which can not operate as individuals or partnerships, but only in corporate form. One might almost believe directors Chicago Board of Trade have gone red, defying law and government.

C. E. HUFF.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE—ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled joint resolution (H. J. ADDITIONAL PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH presented a letter in the nature of a petition from the Baltimore Fruit & Produce Association, of Baltimore, Md., praying for the passage of the bill (S. 3866) to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented letters in the nature of memorials from several citizens of the State of Maryland, remonstrating against the imposition of a tariff duty on lumber and taxes on automobiles and gasoline, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a letter in the nature of a petition from John H. Dockman & Co., of Baltimore, Md., remonstrating against the imposition of taxes on chewing gum, candies and other confections, and favoring instead the imposition of a general sales tax, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a letter from J. B. Fleming, president the Mountain View Nursery Co., of Williamsport, Md., suggesting the adoption of a $3,000 exemption on the taxation of small corporations in the pending revenue bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a letter from H. O. Nicol, president Maryland State School for the Deaf Alumni Association, Frederick, Md., inclosing a statement in opposition to section 207, Title II, part 2, of House bill 11267, the legislative appropriation bill, affecting holiday, Sunday, night, and overtime pay of employees of the Government Printing Office, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Church Hill and vicinity, in the State of Maryland, remonstrating against the passage of legislation providing for the closing of barber shops on Sunday in the District of Columbia, or other restrictive religious measures, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented letters and telegrams in the nature of petitions from several citizens of Baltimore, Md., and Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the inclusion of a manufacturers' sales tax in the pending revenue bill, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Hagerstown, Salisbury, Laurel, and Baltimore, in the State of Maryland, remonstrating against the imposition of taxes on the automobile industry and urging instead the adoption of some form of general sales tax, with necessary exemptions, which were ordered to lie on the table.

LEGISLATION BY CONGRESS URGED

Mr. METCALF. Mr. President, I have received several hundred letters from Rhode Island citizens, fairly representative of the business interests of the State, urging that the Congress bring about an early balancing of the Budget through curtailment of expenses and through the imposition of a manufacturers' sales tax. In addition to these letters, I have had petitions signed in total by some 6,000 citizens, urging drastic governmental economies, a sales tax, and expedition of the revenue bill. Rather than burden the RECORD with these various petitions and letters, I wish to acquaint the Senate with the general trend of public thought in Rhode Island in this manner.

REVENUE AND TAXATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10236) to provide revenue, equalize taxation, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. HOWELL to the amendment of the committee proposing a tax on bank checks.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, we have about discovered that the taxes to be imposed by this bill cover everything from the bank to the rabbit. I have been much interested in the farmers' point of view as it relates to the tax upon checks. I have before me a brief memorandum showing how it will affect the farmers and the bankers in my own State. I am not referring to the large banks, but to the small banks in the small towns. Take, for instance, the People's Bank of North Kansas City, Mo. They write me as follows:

Such action will not only defeat the purpose of the Government but it will also drive out of the banks a large portion of their present business and prevent much future patronage.

Frankly, banking business is too serious a business to tamper with or to disturb, especially under the present conditions. Bankers are having hard enough time keeping up their deposits and maintaining the confidence of the public without interference on the part of the Government.

The Carthage Creamery Co., Carthage, Mo., state—

As a general proposition we are against a tax of this nature, and as a local proposition we feel that it will work a hardship on our dairy farmers in this section, because all of the payments made to them for butterfat are made by check. Last month we issued approximately 27,000 checks to the dairy farmers.

Farmers' Produce Exchange, St. James, Mo., write—

We have quite a few of our M. F. A. institutions in the State of Missouri, which are cooperative organizations, that pay for all the commodities they purchase by check. Very often we write checks down to a very low denomination, especially since eggs have gone as low as 8½ cents per dozen at the country points. These eggs are generally marketed in small amounts, as low as two dozen at a time, and I believe the average purchase at these points would figure about six dozen. We also purchase cream at all of these stations, paying by check, and with butterfat at 10 cents per pound, you can readily see that it wouldn't hardly look right to have to add a 2-cent tax on checks of these denominations.

Mr. President, I have a few other brief extracts from letters written to me by exchanges and small country banks showing the large number of checks issued in small denominations to the farmer. I ask permission to insert them in the RECORD without reading in order to economize the time of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. COUZENS in the chair). Without objection, that will be done.

The extracts referred to are as follows:

Alton Bank, Alton, Mo.: "Our customers are farmers with limited means and it would just mean withdrawals almost to a man with us. We believe that one-half of our checks are for an amount less than $2, and this would add an enormous amount of additional work to say nothing of the expense to those who are trying to do business with us on the meager amount they have to use."

Bank of St. James, Mo.: "It is discriminative because the tax is the same on small or large checks.

"It curtails a medium of exchange which has become a vital factor in the transaction of business.

"It will encourage the return to the antiquated system of pay by cash.

"It will encourage withdrawal of funds from banks, increase currency circulation, and reduce bank deposits.

"It will promote an increase of holdups, robbery, and attendant crime."

Bank of Perryville, Mo.: "It will work a hardship on all the small banks, for many people who now deposit with them will carry their money around and keep it at home."

Columbia Savings Bank, Columbia, Mo.: "This is a nuisance tax that affects all classes of business and will encourage people to carry their money in their pockets and not deposit in the banks."

Baltimore Bank, Kansas City, Mo.: "It would undoubtedly retard business transactions and under the proposed plan of having the banks affix these stamps would cost the banks more than a reasonable per cent of the revenue it would produce the Government."

The Bank of Carthage, Mo.: "This will cause more hoarding than anything they could possibly do. It will also be a very distinct burden on some types of business.

"For instance, we have a creamery account; they buy cream in small amounts from farmers. These farmers wish their pay check weekly. Last month this company issued 17,719 cream checks to farmers in this vicinity; 50 per cent of these checks were for less less than $5. A tax of 2 cents per check applied to this account would cost the creamery $354.38 a month based on April business. Due to the very low price of dairy products the creamery is not making that much money per month net, and if this tax were to be applied, the only way it could possibly be taken care of would be to pass it on to the farmers."

American Dairies (Inc.), Kansas City, Mo.: "Naturally the type of business for which I am responsible is one largely with the farmer. Thousands and thousands of small farmer checks pass daily in our business, and the majority of these checks will probably average less than $2 each. Of course there are some amounting to possibly $7 or $8 each, but those of the larger amounts are decidedly in the minority."

Sturdivant Bank, Cape Girardeau, Mo.: "The International Shoe Co., of St. Louis, who now pays weekly by individual checks to each laborer, expects to pay only twice a month by checks in order to save the added cost of stamp tax. You can readily see this will be very hurtful to the laborer, who now gets very small earnings anyway."

The Farmers Bank, Powersville, Mo.: "When deposits are at a low ebb and small balances prevail, will have a tendency for balance to be withdrawn and payments made in cash, requiring banks to carry more ready cash, and holdup insurance, now so high, that it would almost be prohibitive for country banks to carry any more cash and subject themselves to holdups. * * *"

William Hirth, president Missouri Farmers Association, Columbia, Mo.: "Check tax will place extremely heavy and unfair burden on Missouri Farmers Association, which operates 700 cooperative agencies and does annual business in excess of $100,000,000."

Kansas City Bridge Co., Kansas City, Mo.: "It has been our custom to pay our labor pay rolls with checks to each individual. Also other obligations are paid by check. Manifestly, if a tax of 2 cents per check is levied, it will be necessary for us to pay our pay rolls in cash, thereby saving this expense and increasing the risk of handling our business."

W. F. Hall, Kansas City, Mo.: "Since the financial structure of the Nation depends in such a large measure on the well-being of its banks, I do not believe anything should be done which might affect them so materially as this measure undoubtedly would."

Hugh Stephens, the Exchange National Bank, Jefferson City, Mo.: "These stamps will discourage the keeping of money in banks and start a new type of hoarding to avoid the use of the stamps. In the aggregate, we think this will materially reduce the amount of money left on deposit. In our particular institution we will be put to the expense of carrying a stock of these stamps, making double examination of thousands of checks daily to see that the law is complied with and as heretofore will have to supply in many cases missing stamps in order to avoid costly and inconvenient delays in correspondence, calling back customers who failed to attach the stamps."

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, we have heard of the effect of this proposed tax on the farmer, but what of the city? I subscribe for a newspaper, and the newspaper carrier brings that newspaper to my house every morning at 6 o'clock. At the end of the month I pay him for his services $1.50. He does not get there except at 6 o'clock; I never see him. The consequence is I send him a check. The same thing happens with the cream and ice that are delivered in the morning. I have been informed that the vast majority of checks drawn are under $5. May I ask the chairman of the Finance Committee if there was any testimony before the committee indicating the percentage of checks for $5 and under?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that in the case of the creamery industry the majority of the checks are for $5 or under; but that does not apply to the whole United States.

Mr. HAWES. Did the committee hear any testimony as to the percentage of checks which are for $5 or under throughout the United States?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I doubt whether such information could be collected unless a special examination were made.

Mr. HAWES. I have been informed, Mr. President, that some information has been given to the Finance Committee showing that the burden of this 2-cent tax will really fall upon checks of $5 and less.

Mr. SMOOT. So far as farm checks are concerned, there is no doubt that a great majority of them are for less than $5.

Mr. HAWES. The great majority of them?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. HAWES. Does not the Senator think that the same thing is true of the cities as well?

Mr. SMOOT. It will apply there, but not to such an extent as it does in the rural districts, in the case of creameries, for instance.

Mr. HAWES. Am I right, then, in stating that checks for less than $5 constitute the greater percentage of all checks issued by depositors of banks?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not think so.

Mr. HAWES. How close would that statement approximate the actuality in the Senator's opinion?

Mr. SMOOT. Including the creamery business and other small businesses which issue checks, I think perhaps the number of such small checks would be 35 per cent of the total, or something like that.

Mr. HAWES. Thirty-five per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. Perhaps a third of them, but not more than that, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. HAWES. If we extended it to $10 checks, would that bring the number up to 60 per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. Really I would not want to give an estimate, but I will say that the number is very large.

Mr. HAWES. The number is very large.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President——

Mr. HAWES. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HOWELL. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that I asked the leading bank of Omaha a week ago last Monday to list its checks according to amounts. On the day for which the report was submitted they had some 25,000 checks, 27 per cent of which were for $5 and under and about 38 per cent for $10 and under. Of course, that was the report for only one day, but the figures thus furnished are better than a guess and will give an idea of about the percentage.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think it is about 30 per cent.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HAWES. I yield.

Mr. KING. Of course, the Senator appreciates the fact that the tax now under discussion is in the nature of a sales tax or an income tax or a consumption tax. The Senator ought not to object to it, because he is in favor of a sales tax.

Mr. HAWES. Oh, no; the Senator is in error.

Mr. KING. I beg the Senator's pardon; I thought he was.

Mr. HAWES. If the Senator would like to be informed——

Mr. KING. I thought the Senator was one of the protagonists of the sales tax.

Mr. HAWES. We do not call it a sales tax. I am in favor of a limited manufacturers' license tax which exempts the farmer, which excludes medicine, which excludes clothing, which excludes food, and various other things. I call that a manufacturers' license tax. We have found that the plan of taxation of your committee—and I say with all due respect, "your committee," though I do not mean really the Senator's committee, because I do not believe he is very proud of it—extends, as I said a moment ago, from banks to rabbits, and the other plan is limited.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me further, I know of but few, if any, taxes that do not reach from the cradle to the grave. Taxes bear finally upon the great consuming public; no matter how we may attempt to draft them, their incidence finally is upon the backs of the consuming public.

As to the tax upon checks, a man or woman does not draw a check unless he or she has money in the bank. A tax on checks is a tax—a small tax—upon the money which they have, upon their earnings, upon their outgo, and yet the tax of which my friend is an advocate, call it a manufacturers' tax or a sales tax, is a tax which must be borne ultimately by the mass of the people; there can be no question about that.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, the kind-hearted Senator, I know, frequently has calls made upon him to buy tickets for charity. Every time he buys a ticket and sends a check he is charged 2 cents for it. Every time he responds to a charitable appeal, or pays the great variety of small items which nobody could collect without losing money, and which the Senator could not pay in cash without occupying his secretary's entire time in running around and paying them at the place where they were due, he has to place a 2-cent stamp on the check he issues.

We have just discovered who will have to bear the burden of this thing. It is not the man who issues a $100 check, or a $500 check, or a $1,000 check. The man who will pay 60 per cent of this entire tax is the man who issues checks for $10 and less.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, there are many people of large means who issue checks of $10 and less. Small checks are not written exclusively by people of limited means. People of large resources, people whose expenditures go into the thousands and tens of thousands of dollars annually, draw small checks, either through themselves or through the machinery of their organizations. So that the small checks are issued in large part by business concerns and by men of large means, as well as by the dairymen and men of small means.

Mr. HAWES. The Senator, of course, understands the temptation of our citizens to try to avoid taxes. No one likes them. It seems that in addition to this burden being borne by the small check, it will mean the withdrawal of money from banks. It will mean the hoarding of money. It will mean an unsettling of financial conditions, especially in the smaller communities.

I have been unable so far, Mr. President, to find anything very satisfactory in this bill. Apparently, the burden is to be borne by a few people; but the more we examine it, the more we find that it will reach all classes of our people with a very heavy nuisance tax, if you please, an irritating sort of thing.

I want my position understood by the distinguished Senator from Utah. I am not favoring a general sales tax. I have been opposed to it.

The measure that I have just read is a limited manufacturers' license tax, which I understand will produce some $335,000,000, and if we take what is called the Connally increase in income-tax rates—a little higher than the committee's report, and not so high as the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS]—it will give us another $100,000,000, and in that way the Budget may be balanced without as much irritation as is proposed by these various plans.

Mr. President, some time ago I sent to the desk an amendment to insert on page 286, line 1, after the comma, the words "for $100 or over." I should like to modify that by having it read "for $50 or over," and I ask that that amendment may be now considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood that the amendment proposing a $5 exemption was pending first.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the pending question, as I understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes. That is an amendment to the committee amendment.

The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], eliminating the tax on checks below $5.

Mr. HAWES. I was temporarily out of the Chamber, and did not know that this amendment had been offered. Who introduced the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL].

Mr. HAWES. I withdraw my amendment temporarily, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] to the amendment of the committee on page 286, line 2, after the word "company," to insert a comma and the words "for an amount in excess of $5."

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] was very much interested in this matter.

Mr. SMOOT. He has already spoken.

Mr. BLAINE. I was wondering whether we are going to have a vote. If we are, I suggest the absence of a quorum. If not, I will not take the time.

Mr. SMOOT. Unless some Senator who desires to speak is in the Chamber, we might as well have a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin suggests the absence of a quorum. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Dale	Howell	Reed
Bailey	Davis	Hull	Robinson, Ark.
Bankhead	Dickinson	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Seventy-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. REED obtained the floor.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. There has been much talk among Senators as to whether or not there is to be a meeting of the Senate on Monday.

I have conferred with the minority leader and with various Members on the other side and quite a number on this side, together with the Senator having the bill in charge; and we have come to the conclusion that we should meet on Monday and should not adjourn over until Tuesday. Because of the congested condition of our calendar and the demands made throughout the country for the passage of very important legislation which we have in hand, we consider that it is the most patriotic thing for us to do to remain here and attend to and discharge our obligations.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. I merely want to ask the Senator from Indiana whether he thinks it is impossible for us to finish this bill to-morrow.

Mr. WATSON. I am rather inclined to think it is, from the present situation.

Mr. HARRISON. I hope it will not be impossible. I hope we can drive ahead in such a way that we can clean it up and get the bill to conference by to-morrow night.

Mr. WATSON. That is a "consummation devoutly to be wished"; but I am not certain, in view of the situation, that it can be done.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I can readily understand that the proposal to put a tax of 2 cents on a check of 50 or 60 cents, given to a farmer's wife in payment for eggs that she sells, is equivalent to a proposal to put a 4 or 5 per cent sales tax on that small transaction.

I do not think anybody in this Chamber wants to accomplish that result, but I want to suggest that it is not a necessary result of the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance. As Senators will see, this check tax in section 741 applies only to drafts, orders, or checks drawn upon any bank, banker, or trust company.

Out in Ohio, I am told by the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], there is at least one company which follows the practice of giving to the people who sell poultry and eggs an order for the payment of the money on a form such as that I hold in my hand, drawn upon the drawer itself. This concern is called the Brownell Co., and they give this order:

Pay to the order of_____dollars

That is addressed to the Brownell Co., and marked "Payable at the Washington Savings Bank, Washington Court House, Ohio."

I am told that those orders are given in very large numbers every day.

If they were drawn on the bank, they would take a 2-cent stamp, under the provision of this bill; but being drawn on this company, they are not taxable, and the Treasury would so hold.

At the end of the day all of these orders which have been honored at the bank are lifted by a single check drawn on the bank itself, and the purchaser pays the 2 cents on that check. So that it is perfectly possible for these farm cooperatives and for all purchasers of dairy products, poultry and eggs, throughout the country, to use this form of order, which will not require any stamp; and I can say with confidence, because I have consulted the Treasury, that it would not require a stamp.

I am in full sympathy with the intention of the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] in offering his amendment; but I hope it will not be adopted, because the people he wants to protect can protect themselves, and the people we want to tax—you, and me, and all of us who draw checks in small amounts sometimes—might very well pay the 2 cents for convenience.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I appreciate very much the Senator's attitude; but I wonder if he will permit me to make two suggestions.

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. Although he has, as nearly as any human being could, met one of them by consulting with the Treasury.

I have an amendment pending to a different part of this bill, the object of which is to make clear the existing law on tax exemptions for the kind of organizations to which I have referred.

We have undertaken to make cooperative organizations exempt under the income tax law. We have not succeeded, because the Bureau of Internal Revenue has taken all sorts of technical advantages to make it difficult for anyone to get the advantage of what was clearly the intention of Congress, so that out of over 12,000 cooperative associations in the United States about 600 only have exemptions. They have given up trying to get under the law. It has cost them too much money. There are too many technicalities, and, as I shall show when we come to that amendment, they have said, "We had better pay the tax than run the risk of getting into difficulties."

There is another reason against the Senator's suggestion, and that is that the only object, I take it, the committee had in offering this amendment was to reduce revenue.

Mr. REED. Surely.

Mr. NORRIS. If such means as the Senator has suggested are resorted to, there will not be the revenue collected. It will certainly reduce the revenue. Suppose this bank, in the one instance I gave, in a very small place, where there were 17 checks in one day, should do the same thing. There would be paid only 2 cents on those 17 checks.

Mr. REED. That is perfectly true.

Mr. NORRIS. So we would lose only 2 cents from revenue if we exempted them.

Mr. REED. While it is true that the farm cooperatives, and the purchasers of farm products, can use this method I have suggested, I could not use it, nor could the Senator from Nebraska use it. The small checks we write will have to bear the tax, and it is right that they should.

Mr. NORRIS. My checks, I will say to the Senator, if he will permit, that I do not write a check for $5 once in six months. I never knew a Senator to have a bill presented to him, at least while he was in Washington, that was as small as $5, no matter what it was for.

Mr. REED. When the Senator talks about the attitude of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, he awakes a responsive chord in my heart, because when I was young I was taught that a tax bill ought always to be construed most favorably toward the taxpayer, that that was a fundamental principle of legislative construction. Since we have gotten into these income tax laws, the policy not only of the bureau, but of the Federal courts, has apparently been to extort the revenue if the language were capable of any kind of distortion to justify it.

Mr. NORRIS. I think that is a correct statement.

Mr. REED. I have oftentimes taken occasion publicly to scold about that. I think we have departed from a very safe rule in our jurisprudence. So that now we use every ingenuity to stretch the law to make the tax attach, whereas our ancestors used to say that the tax was not payable unless the law clearly required it.

However, on orders in the form of that to which I referred, it is perfectly clear to me—and the Treasury agrees—that the order is not on a bank or banker or trust company, and consequently is not subject to the tax.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit another interruption?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. From my experience with the construction placed upon our laws by the Bureau of Internal Revenue I am very fearful, although the present officials having really just made a promise to the Senator—I have no doubt they would carry it out—of the construction they will eventually put on the sort of order to which the Senator has called our attention. I dare say they would not go nearly as far in their construction as they have already gone in other cases, but I fear they would go to the extent of saying that the means suggested by this order indicates a plain intention to evade the law.

Mr. REED. I do not think they could, because our law, as we enact it, would provide "an order for the payment of money drawn on a bank." This is not drawn on a bank. That is the answer.

Mr. NORRIS. Really, I think the object of it is to evade the tax, myself. It seems to me such a holding would not be a misconstruction.

Mr. REED. It is doing a perfectly lawful act in a way that is not taxable. I do not think that even the Bureau of Internal Revenue, or the Federal courts, could hold that it was within this statute.

The criticisms of the Senator of the Bureau of Internal Revenue apply just as well to all of the appellate courts above them. Apparently the construction put upon these taxing laws by every court, up to the Supreme Court of the United States, is to get every penny of tax the language can be stretched to cover, unless it be upon the Federal judiciary, and there they are extremely tender and anxious to stretch the language the other way.

Mr. HAWES and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. REED. The Senator from Missouri asked me to yield first, but the Senator from Utah is in charge of the bill. I wonder whether the Senator from Missouri would not let him interrupt first?

Mr. HAWES. I will wait.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, since this matter has been brought to my attention, I have tried to think whether there was any evasion of the stamp tax from any source when it was in operation. I do not recall ever seeing a charge that there was an evasion of the stamp tax contained in preceding laws imposing a tax upon checks. There was no limitation upon that. The tax was 2 cents upon a check. I suppose the creamery organizations were in existence at that time, were they not?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but they were very limited in comparison with what they are now. There were such things, but all of these large cooperative institutions, or at least many of them, have been organized and developed and expanded since we passed the marketing act.

Mr. SMOOT. I recognize the fact that what has been stated by the Senator from Pennsylvania can be done.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, so that what we are saying may be understandable to those who read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I ask that there may be put into the RECORD at this time the form of order about which I have been talking, which is nontaxable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Main office
Washington C. H., Ohio
The Brownell Co., poultry and eggs. Highest price for quality.
No. 6951
_____193___
Pay to the order of_____$_____ _____dollars
The Brownell Co.
Payable at the Washington Savings Bank, Washington C. H., Ohio.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, having put into the RECORD a copy of the nontaxable order, I would like to have printed in the RECORD the bank check which takes up the many orders at the close of each day, and which, of course, would be taxable with a 2-cent stamp under the Senate committee amendment.

I ask that this be published in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The Brownell Co., eggs and live poultry
No.
Washington C. H., Ohio, _____19__
Pay to the order of_____$_____ _____dollars
For_____
The Brownell Co.,
By _____
To the Washington Savings Bank,
56-366 Washington C. H., Ohio.

Mr. REED. Now I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President, I understand to a certain extent the form used by the farmer in evading the tax. What is the system the Senator is going to suggest for the city?

Mr. REED. I am not suggesting a system of evading the tax at all. I say that where a large number of small purchases are made, in town or city, by an established company of this sort, it is possible for it to give an order upon itself for the payment of the money at its bank, and that is not taxable. But for myself, living in a city, or in the country, for that matter, and paying current bills, I know of no way in which I can give similar orders. If I give a $2 order to somebody who sends me a bill for that amount, payable by myself at my bank, I will have to take it up at the close of the day with a $2 check, and I will have to put a stamp on that. For the great run of small checks, in the city or in the country, the stamp tax will have to be put on. It is only where there is such a process of gathering farm products as that resorted to by the cooperatives that the stamp tax need not be paid.

Mr. HAWES. That affects the farmer only, and there is no remedy for the man in the city?

Mr. REED. I do not see any.

Mr. HAWES. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania know what percentage of checks are for $5 and under?

Mr. REED. No; I do not. I know that the average amount per check is stated by some people as being about $175.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, so that I may enlighten the Senator from Missouri somewhat on that?

Mr. REED. I gladly yield.

Mr. NORRIS. It depends a great deal, of course, upon the locality. Among poorer classes of people the checks would be much smaller. But my colleague put into the RECORD to-day the figures showing one day's operations of a bank in Omaha, Nebr., and he showed that the average there of 27 per cent were for less than $5, as I remember it.

Mr. REED. I can quite believe that.

Mr. NORRIS. And there were about 25,000 checks in the calculation.

Mr. HAWES. Let me say to the Senator from Pennsylvania that during his absence, when there were very few Senators present, I was trying to ascertain where the burden of the stamp tax would fall. Unless I am mistaken, the figures furnished by both the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] and by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] show that 50 or 60 per cent of this tax will be upon checks for $10 or less.

Mr. REED. I think that must be a mistake.

Mr. SMOOT. No; I do not think that is correct.

Mr. REED. If I may express my opinion, not fortified by statistics, but, rather, as a result of observation, I should say that the tax in large part will be paid by the employers who resort to the payment of wages weekly by check in order to get away from this business of pay-roll robbery, which has very much increased in the last few years.

Mr. HAWES. I have in mind the householder. For instance, my paper carrier charges me $1.50 a month to deliver the daily paper at my house. He delivers it at 6 o'clock in the morning, before I am up and before the family is up.

Mr. REED. The Senator is a very late riser.

Mr. HAWES. I have my breakfast at 7, which is not far from 6. There is one check. What about the milk man and the butter man and all those people? There may be a plan for a cooperative in some State to evade the law, but how about the householder, who must use checks in rather small amounts? They must bear the full brunt of this tax. It is not the $100 checks or the $500 checks or the $1,000 checks, but it is the small checks that will pay the $95,000,000. That sum will be paid by the man who keeps the small bank account.

Mr. REED. No; I do not agree with the Senator. The $95,000,000 will be paid by all the people of the United States who keep bank accounts.

Mr. HAWES. But three-quarters of that will be paid by the small checks.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think in connection with the orders put in the RECORD by the Senator from Pennsylvania, together with the check to take up the various orders, it perhaps ought to be stated, which must be the case, that by arrangement between the bank and the company issuing the orders the bank agrees to pay to the holder of the order upon presentation of the order the amount therein called for. That is to say, assuming it was issued to patrons of a creamery in payment for cream, they deliver their cream at the creamery, an order is issued such as indicated, the patron takes the order to the bank, and the bank pays immediately the amount, just the same as if it were a check.

In other words, there necessarily must be some agreement between the company issuing the order and the bank by which the bank has agreed that upon presentation of the order it will pay the amount.

Mr. REED. I am told by a gentleman from the Treasury who is familiar with this practice that there is no such agreement with the bank, that there is merely a custom by which, at the end of the day, these orders which have been cashed by the bank or bought by the bank are in turn bought by its customers; that there is no authority to charge the orders against the bank account of that customer in the bank.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. But the custom or the practice really amounts to an implicit understanding between the company issuing the order and the bank that the bank will pay.

Mr. REED. If that were true, there would be no necessity for the check to take up the orders, but the orders would be charged against the account of the creamery company.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course that is a mere matter of convenience.

Mr. REED. It may be; but that is the practice.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Ohio, who knows more about this than I do.

Mr. FESS. I think there may be some misunderstanding by Mr. Brownell, who was here and presented this matter, in order to know whether this order would be subject to the tax. We are using the term "evading the law," and I am afraid if he should read the RECORD he would interpret it to be a wrongful evasion of the law. It has been the practice for 40 years. The Senator from Pennsylvania has explained just how they proceed. When they purchase from the farmer, instead of paying cash or carrying the change with them for that purpose, they just issue a form of due bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. There is no doubt at all that the man who gets the order may go immediately to the bank and get his money.

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. REED. But he has not any contractual right to get it. Let me explain to Mr. Brownell what we mean by "tax evasion." It is just like a citizen who comes to a river. He finds two bridges, one a free public bridge and the other a toll bridge. He goes over the free bridge. It can not be said that he is evading the toll. He is taking that method which is not taxable, and he is not resorting to the method that is taxable. Nobody can fairly charge him with evading the tax.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. BLAINE. Why could not industrial organizations or merchants use the same type of order in payment of wages and bills payable or any expenses connected with the industry or the merchant? Why could he not issue the so-called due bill or order, and at the end of the day or the end of the week or the end of the month give his single check in payment of all the due bills or orders which he had issued?

Mr. REED. He would have to do it every day because at the close of the business for the day the bank would have to charge his account.

Mr. BLAINE. Limit it to every day, then. Why could not that be done?

Mr. REED. It would not be worth while in the case of most individuals to resort to such a method. I can see that a large corporation, with thousands and thousands of pay checks, might resort to the same method. In that case there would be no tax payable and in that case we would be disappointed in the yield. But even if we adopt the amendment suggested by the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] we will not get away from that proposition. We may exempt the small $5 check, but there is nothing to prevent the General Electric Co. or any other big employer from resorting to the Brownell method, which I just put in the RECORD, and paying wages that way. I do not think they will do it; but if they do, the tax will not attach to them and to that extent we will be disappointed.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Why does the Senator think they will not do it? Here is a corporation with 10,000 employees. If they issue checks twice a month to those 10,000 employees, this check tax would amount to a very considerable sum. Why should not they escape the tax in that way?

Mr. REED. Possibly they will. Perhaps they will think the bother of it makes up for the saving or the saving makes up for the bother. They may resort to it and the amendment of the junior Senator from Nebraska will not prevent them from resorting to it.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. HULL. I would like to inquire of the Senator whether it would be possible to define this transaction and insert it as an amendment in order to satisfy and make more certain its operation?

Mr. REED. In other words, make the tax attach to any bill of exchange drawn upon any person, including the drawer?

Mr. HULL. Make it definite whichever way it is desired.

Mr. REED. Then I suppose they would resort to the use of mere receipts and buy back those receipts.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. The Senator will recall that when the tax on checks was considered I was opposed to it, and only consented to it after the $5 exemption was written in the bill. The reason why I was concerned was because we were taxing the small checks that are given to farmers for produce.

The order which the Senator has placed in the RECORD is not an unusual way that these matters are handled by the country banks. I am pleased to know the country banks can arrange with the produce buyers, whether it be a cooperative association or private buyers. It makes a matter of very cumbersome bookkeeping to put all of the small checks on the ledger in the accounts in the bank, so they can arrange to use these orders and before they close the business for the day the produce buyers may come in and give a check for all the orders they have issued during the day.

Mr. REED. In that case the creamery or the produce buyer would have to pay but a 2-cent tax on each check, and would avoid paying a 2-cent tax on each of the numerous orders issued in small amounts during the day. He would pay merely one 2-cent tax on the check that would clean up all the transactions of the day.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. That is the reason why the cooperatives are interested in the matter. They issue hundreds of checks and the amount of the tax, if they had to pay a tax upon each of those little checks, would be oppressive.

Mr. REED. I think the Senator can safely advise them that no matter how this passes, whether with or without the amendment of the junior Senator from Nebraska, they are not taxable on those orders which they give out in such large numbers.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. I do not like the check tax, but we have to tax something somewhere. I realize the obstacles of the $5-exemption amendment. For instance, one may have a $25 bill to pay. He is very likely to write five checks of $5 each in order to avoid payment of the tax and in order to take advantage of the exemption.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator, because he has expressed the idea that I was going to give out.

Mr. President, we talk about tax evasions. It is only right that we should realize that there will be other methods of escaping the payment of this tax. We in our own banks are accustomed to see on the desks of the banks what are known as counter checks. If we want to get a few dollars for pocket money, we go into the bank, sign one of those checks, and we present it, and they give us the money. That is known as a counter check. If we pass the stamp tax law, undoubtedly the banks will go back to the practice which they adopted in the Spanish War days and use mere receipts, shaped like a check, treated like a check, so far as the bank accounting is concerned, but which merely say that "I have received from the Riggs National Bank $50, which charge to my account." That is signed and we get the money. So far as the bank is concerned that explains the debit which they have to put in our individual account.

That undoubtedly will be the case, and we will lose some possible revenue in that way. But all that has been taken into account in the Treasury estimates as I understand it. The yield of the tax is so important and its incidence upon commercial transactions is so slight that it worked very well in Spanish War days; it works very well in Great Britain to-day; and it will work very well in the United States the rest of this year if we adopt it. I hope it will be adopted in the form in which the committee presents it.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. FESS. Has there been any action at all on the manner of collection?

Mr. REED. No; that remains to be seen.

Mr. FESS. That is the only serious objection that comes to my mind.

Mr. REED. The vote that we are about to take now deals only with the imposition of the tax and the question whether it should include small checks as well as large checks. That is the only question. The next question is whether it shall be a stamp tax as in the United States in Spanish War days, as in Great Britain to-day, or whether it shall be this process of deduction by the bank, from the deposit account, and remittance by the bank to the Treasury.

As a member of the committee when the Treasury Department made that suggestion, I thought that that had been submitted to a number of bankers and approved by them; in fact, I thought the American Bankers' Association approved that method; but since our report has been made we have had such a volume of dissent from the banks of the country against the method of collecting that I am personally convinced we ought to go back to the old stamp-tax method of the Spanish-American War days. That, however, is a question that remains for disposition after this matter shall have been disposed of.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I have been very seriously concerned about the particular amendment because of the statement made as to the amount of revenue involved. At first blush it seemed to me utterly incredible that checks drawn in an amount less than $5, if taxed under this bill, would yield $40,000,000 or more in revenue. I listened, however, with great interest to the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], to the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL], and to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HAWES], and I see that in a particular line, with which I have not been familiar, it does make a vast difference, and that it puts a very onerous burden upon the constituencies whom they represent.

Now, it has been suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] that this tax could be avoided by adopting the system that has been adopted by the Brownell Co. I can not agree with the construction that is put upon the Brownell system by the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Treasury Department. I can not agree with an interpretation of the law that although there is imposed a tax of 2 cents upon checks, drafts, or orders for the payment of money drawn upon any bank, banker, or trust company yet that the tax need not be paid where the particular individual who owes the money draws a paper, we may term it, in the name of the individual to whom he is indebted, and upon the face of that paper it is stated, in substance, "This will be paid at a particular bank," and the individual who receives this paper from the Brownell Co., for instance, at any instant after that paper is given him may go to the bank in question and get his money. I can not understand how there would ever be a construction put upon the law other than that such a paper came within the purview of the law.

It is quite true the Senator from Pennsylvania protects that system by what is stated by the Secretary of the Treasury, or by some one in his behalf. That, of course, I do not question, and I do not question that the Secretary of the Treasury would rule, if the matter came to him, exactly as has been indicated. However, we have got to remember that there may be another Secretary of the Treasury next year, and he may feel that the construction to be put upon this particular section of the law should be at variance with the construction that might be put upon it to-day.

However, beyond that, while we do not like the term "evasion," and we do not like to say that anybody is endeavoring to get around the tax, in reality if an institution has been following a course of business up to the time of the enactment of this law, and has been giving its checks in $1, $2, $3, $4, or $5, as the case may be, and then immediately upon the enactment of the law gives a sort of draft upon itself, payable instantly at a bank where it has its deposit and its account, I can not for the life of me understand how any court could construe the transaction otherwise than as an attempt to get around the law.

What is the use, let me ask seriously, of suggesting methods of getting around the law? If this amendment is one that ought to be adopted, let us adopt it, but not say to those who want the little boon that is afforded by this amendment, "You may avoid the paying of the tax that is assessed against you in this law by taking a course which will beat the devil around the stump and enable you to get out of paying the tax." So I submit, upon any theory, it is up to us to determine whether or not we want to adopt this amendment and not to discuss whether or not there can be avoided a particular provision of the tax law.

Mr. HULL. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from California if it is not his view that we should in any event make this provision more definite before we finally dispose of it, as there seems to be a wide difference of opinion on the question?

Mr. JOHNSON. I listened to the query that was propounded by the Senator from Tennessee a few moments ago. It seems to me that if we endeavor to write into this law the Brownell scheme we shall be simply writing into the law a method for the evasion of the tax which we seek to impose.

Mr. HULL. My purpose in asking the question was to ascertain whether we could not at least prescribe something more definite as to the real import of the provision, whether construing it in favor of the tax or against the tax in a given transaction.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator is quite right, if it is desired to exempt checks up to $5; but there is the rub. Some want to exempt checks up to $5 and some do not, and if we endeavor to write into the law the exemption of those checks, of course, we can do it in very few but definite words, concerning which there would be absolutely no two modes of construction.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I said when the Senator from Pennsylvania first presented the order or check which he placed in the RECORD that it looked to me that it was an attempt to evade the law. I have not read the order itself.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. FRAZIER. I do not think the Senator from Pennsylvania meant to suggest it as a method of evading the law but as a method of farm relief.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, Mr. President, in any case it seems to me that there is not anything to it except an attempt to evade the law. I do not want to vote to pass a law and then as we are about to pass it have someone say that though we are going to enforce the law it contains a suggestion as to how it may be evaded. I do not want the Treasury Department to gather from this discussion that Congress is of the opinion that when we pass this law they can put on it a construction, if they see fit, by which there may be a practical evasion of the law. I can not see it in any other way. I believe it will be the duty of the Treasury Department or of the courts, if such a case shall come before the department or the courts, to say, "This is plainly an attempt to evade the law and we will not permit it." If we are going to enact a law and at the time we pass it point out some method of evasion, we had better adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee and amend the law so that it can not be evaded. I do not want any evasion of the law by cooperative organizations. I am just as much opposed to letting them evade the law as I am letting anybody else evade it; but if we are going to suggest to them how to evade it, and are going to permit its evasion in that way, we must likewise let it be evaded by everybody else who tries to evade it; and, in my judgment, we will see the law practically nullified if we do that.

Again, as I pointed out to the Senator from Pennsylvania previously, if this method of evasion is going to be practiced and carried out, the Government is going to get no revenue. I called attention in the remarks which I made a while ago to one day's deliveries at the delivery station of a great cooperative institution. At that particular delivery station on the day referred to there were 17 deliveries and 17 checks were issued. If the Senator's method of evasion was made use of there would be just one check; there would be 16 checks that would pay no revenue, in effect, and one that would pay a revenue of 2 cents; so, at least in principle, we would have the application on these checks at that station for that day of the ratio of 16 to 1, that would take away 16 sources of revenue and leave only one place for revenue to be obtained.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not understand that the Senator from Pennsylvania was pointing out a method to evade the law.

Mr. NORRIS. He did not call it that, of course.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Nor do I.

Mr. NORRIS. All right, the Senator can call it by some other name; but it does not make any difference what we call it. If it has that effect, it is an evasion of the law.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If the Senator will pardon me, I would not call it an evasion of the law. It is merely an attempt to interpret the meaning of the wording thus far in the proposed amendment, and not an attempt at evasion. So, while it is neither here nor there, the use of certain words is not an attempt to evade but an attempt to construe the language which may be uncertain, ambiguous, and perhaps unintelligible.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us make an application of this to a real condition. Take the illustration I gave early in the day. Here are 17 deliveries of cream at a station. Under the law as I construe it, there would be 17 checks drawn, but under the method the Senator proposes there would only be one. Suppose I were operating that delivery station and the customers were coming in kicking about this stamp tax and saying "it is unjust," and I should say, "Yes, it is; but I can tell you how to get around it."

What is the object of it? It is to avoid payment of the tax; there is not anything else in it.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. HAWES. I was called from the room for a while and I should like to know if during my absence there was any plan proposed that would take care of the man in the city who draws checks?

Mr. NORRIS. No; there was not.

Mr. HAWES. No scheme has been proposed for him as yet?

Mr. NORRIS. No; and I do not think the scheme for the other fellow is any good. I do not believe it is fair. I do not want to participate in passing a law here that will permit anybody to evade it.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. If Brownell could do this, why could not anybody else do it?

Mr. NORRIS. Of course anybody else could do it, and, with the Treasury officials telling us what they are going to do for this fellow, they may have to do the same thing for the other one.

Mr. President, it is plain that it is an evasion of the law, and, if we will go back to the question that was submitted to the Senator from Pennsylvania by the Senator from Montana, there can be no doubt of it. Why would the bank pay this order, as it is called? What are they going to pay it for? They know that they are going to get their money out of the corporation that has money on deposit in the bank, and they are paying a written order drawn to somebody else. There is nothing to compel them to pay it, it is true. They could refuse payment, and they would refuse payment unless they knew that the corporation was going to reimburse them. Of course they would. That is simple. That is perfectly plain. So that they have that understanding: "We will cash these orders, and then you will give us a check when we get through."

I do not want to do this way, Mr. President. If we are going to pass a law providing for a stamp tax on all checks, let us pass one that can not be evaded, if we can. Let us not go on the theory that this tax is not going to be paid.

Mr. President, what condition is the Senate going to be in if it passes a law and says to the bulk of the people affected by it, "Here is a way to get out of it. We do not mean you." My contention is that no matter what we say, this thing so far has not been evaded in any legitimate, legal way. It will not work.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. I might say, for the information of the Senator, that this is not a new practice. It is quite a usual practice. It does not apply only to cream checks, but it applies to purchases of any kind of product.

I am not an attorney, and I do not pretend to know any of the legal phases of this question; but I do know that the very thing we are talking about is a practice that has been in existence for a long time.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think that makes any difference. I do not think that affects it at all. Suppose, after the passage of this bill, the method suggested by the Senator came before the court for trial, and it should be shown that up to the passage of this law one of these concerns had a different custom entirely, and immediately after the law was passed it changed its business methods, and then the court said, "Why did you change them? Let us get an honest answer, now." The answer would have to be, "Because we did not want to pay the tax."

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, in answer to that, we had a tax on checks at one time, and we had produce dealers in those days. I am wondering if the same custom was not practiced then, and I am wondering if those orders were taxed.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not know; and, so far as I am concerned, I do not care.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. I venture the assertion that they were not taxed by the law at that time.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me it is a plain proposition that here we are passing a law and suggesting a method by which it can be evaded. If that is true, referring again to the 17 deliveries that I referred to a while ago, instead of getting 2 cents for each one of them, under the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, we are not going to get 2 cents. Carry that all the way through, and what becomes of your $95,000,000?

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. I quite agree that it reduces the amount.

Mr. NORRIS. Practically all of it disappears. We will not get it.

It seems to me the manly thing to do and the right thing to do is either to put this tax in or to put it out. If we want to tax all these checks, let us frame the bill so that they will all have to pay. If we want to eliminate the stamp tax up to $5, let us agree to the pending amendment, and do it in that way.

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, I call the attention of Senators to the methods that have been developed by the great creamery companies for collecting cream.

They collect this cream over large areas, from three and four hundred miles away. They have trucks that pass along the countryside. You have seen the cream can standing out in front near the gate. They pick up the can, and it is hauled to the railway station, and from there it is shipped to a central point; or the farmer drives up to the station and leaves a can of cream with an address upon it, and the cream is delivered without the intervention of a truck. Then what occurs? About every three days or every two days a check is sent to the farmer. There were issued in Nebraska last year probably 10,000,000 checks of this character—checks that did not average more than about $2.40.

I have the following statement from the Fairmont Creamery Co. in Omaha:

> To-day the Omaha National Bank cleared 2,200 farm creamery checks and drafts, averaging $2.39 each. We estimate that we manufacture about 21 to 22 per cent of the butter manufactured in Omaha. Therefore, it is reasonable to say that the Omaha banks clear 10,000 of these small creamery and produce checks daily. The State of Nebraska produces about three and one-half times as much butter as the Omaha creameries.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President——

Mr. HOWELL. Mr. President, it is not practicable to do it in any way other than to send out checks in payment for cream over wide areas, because orders would not be recognized at banks where there was not an understanding between the particular creamery, the banks, and the farmers who happen to be patrons of that creamery. Otherwise, competing creameries would have to carry balances in every bank in the territory, and, of course, if orders were charged to balances they would be subject to tax. The money would be paid through a bank.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Certainly.

Mr. HOWELL. Otherwise, an order would come from one of the banks out in the State to the central bank, and there be paid; and it is absurd to say that it would not be the equivalent of a check. Why, it would amount to a draft.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. It is an order.

Mr. HOWELL. There can be no question as to what the result will be. There is only one safe way to do if we want to care for the farmer, and that is to eliminate checks of at least $5 and less.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. REED. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I desire to state that the methods used in Ohio, or wherever this method was used, in regard to creameries or cooperatives, would not apply to many States where there are sparse settlements, and the shipments are made by express, sometimes as far as two or three hundred miles, the cream cans being taken on the train by express, and then the empty cans returned to the farmer. Oftentimes there is no bank in the local town where this farmer lives, and the check is cashed at a local store in trade. He ships his cream to the remote point because he can get a little more for it there than he can in trade at his local store. If a stamp goes on each of these checks, and forces down the price of cream—and that is what will result—the farmer probably will be compelled to sell his cream in trade to the local store at a lower price than he would get through shipping it as he does at the present time.

The trouble, of course, with the farmers and the average persons who issue small checks or receive small checks for produce that they sell, is that they have no corporation attorney to advise them how they can evade the law and get away from the stamp tax; and they would have to pay it, I think, generally speaking.

I understand that some of the great coal operators in some of the States not so far from here have a method of paying their help by orders on a company store, and I suppose there would be a great deal more of that if a stamp tax were put on checks.

It seems to me that it is absolutely unfair, and would cause hoarding of money instead of putting it in the banks. It would cause people to do just the opposite of what they have been urged to do—namely, to take their money out of hoarding and place it in banks, in circulation. If they have to pay a tax on every check they issue, it seems to me there would be a great deal more of this hoarding and keeping money at home to pay little bills with instead of paying them by check.

Mr. President, I hope the whole check item will be stricken out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. REED. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. NORRIS. Let the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 286, line 2, after the word "company," the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] proposes to insert a comma and the words "for an amount in excess of $5."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not want to debate the matter; but does that amendment come after the word "company," in line 2?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to suggest to my colleague that he insert the amendment after the word "money," in line 1, instead. Does the amendment say "in excess of $5"?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the committee amendment is, on page 286, line 2, after the word "company," to insert a comma and the words "for an amount in excess of $5."

Mr. NORRIS. I am suggesting to my colleague that he insert his amendment after the word "money," in line 1, so that it will read, "the payment of money in excess of $5."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Of course the amendment is always within the control of its author. The junior Senator from Nebraska may accept the modification if he desires.

Mr. HOWELL. I accept the suggestion that the amendment be inserted after "money" instead of after "company."

Mr. HARRISON. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Has the junior Senator from Nebraska modified his amendment in accordance with the suggestion of his colleague?

Mr. HOWELL. Yes; I have modified it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays having been ordered, that requires unanimous consent; but the Chair assumes that to be granted. The yeas and nays having been ordered upon the amendment to the amendment as modified by its author, the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE]. He is absent, but I understand he would vote as I shall vote; therefore I am at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. NYE] and vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], and vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DILL. I have a pair with the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK], which I transfer to the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], and vote "nay."

Mr. BYRNES. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN]. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, has the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mrs. CARAWAY] voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I have a pair with the junior Senator from Arkansas, and in her absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. Understanding that he would vote as I shall vote, I am free to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG];

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK]; and

The Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. NEELY].

I am advised that, if present and voting, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] and the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] would vote "yea," and that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] would vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 39, as follows:

So Mr. HOWELL's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, when this matter was before the Finance Committee, it was represented to us by the Treasury that instead of a stamp tax on each check, such as we had during the Spanish-American War days, it would be preferable if the banks themselves were required, without the use of stamps, to remit to the Government 2 cents on each check that came in and was cashed.

The Treasury stated that while it would require an extra accounting by the bank to remit the 2 cents per check to the Government, yet they thought the banks would prefer that system against the stamp system, because it would not mean tying up so much money in checks on which the stamps had been printed.

Perhaps what they said to us did not deserve that construction, but I took it to be the meaning of the Treasury's testimony that the banks had expressed a preference for deducting the 2 cents from the depositors' accounts, and remitting it to the Government without the use of stamps.

Since we reported out the bill with this provision in its present form, such a volume of protest has come in that I am perfectly convinced that the banks of the country, on the whole, would very much prefer the use of the old stamp system we used during the Spanish War, whereby the stamp may be printed upon the check by the manufacturer, or may be gummed to the check by the drawer of the check, who may use either a revenue stamp or a postage stamp, it being a matter of indifference to the United States Government. So that from the standpoint of the banks, it is very much preferable that the old system be used, rather than this new and untried system.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, what does the Senator think about the people who have to use the stamps? What will be their preference?

Mr. REED. I have thought about that, too, and, of course, they are the people who deserve most consideration. Take the case of any of us, or of a member of the family of any of us. If every time we draw a check we have to subtract from our balance on the stub of our check book not only the amount of the check we draw but 2 cents additional, which the bank is going to subtract, I venture to say that most of the Senators and most of the families of the Senators would be overdrawn about half the time without knowing it; and it may be the male half of the family as well as the female half, because I am quite certain that I myself would forget to subtract the 2 cents just about half the time.

I think that when we consider the nuisance it would be to the average depositor to remember to subtract that 2 cents every time he drew a check, we will come to the conclusion that it would be better to resort to the stamp system, particularly if it will permit the use of the ordinary postage stamp on a check, as we may very well do.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. BINGHAM. The Senator is not old enough to remember the use of stamps on checks during the Spanish-American War, but I remember very distinctly that each member of the family bought a check book at the bank with a 2-cent stamp printed on each check, and when the Government gave up the practice we found ourselves with those books on our hands, and the Government gained thereby, because there was no way of redeeming the tax on checks that were lost or were improperly drawn or were still in the books. Therefore it seems to me that not only will it not be for the benefit of the banks, which would be put to additional expense for something from which they would derive no revenue at all, if this provision is carried out as it is in the bill, but it would be for the benefit of the Government, which, in the long run, would gain a small but sure revenue from checks that were lost, or checks destroyed, or checks still in the books and not used.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Connecticut for his suggestion, as well as for his compliment. I ought to say that I did have a bank account during the Spanish-American War days, although it was not very large, and I distinctly remember the imprinting of the checks. But there was an interval between the imposition of the tax and the printing of the stamps on the check book when, I remember, the gummed stamps were used. I do remember also that when the tax went off we kept on using the stamped checks, because they could not be redeemed.

Mr. SMOOT. I think all the checks which were held by the banks were redeemed by the Government.

Mr. REED. Mine were not. Possibly the checks held by the banks were.

Mr. SMOOT. I know those checks were redeemed.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. COUZENS. I would like to draw the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Senator from Pennsylvania missed a part of the history of this case. When the committee reported out the bill, it had the language in it which was originally considered and is now there. Protests commenced to come in from bankers about being made a collection agency for the Government. As a result of that protest I had an amendment drawn to provide for stamps in lieu of the banks collecting the tax. The amendment was handed to the chairman of the committee, and the chairman of the committee submitted it to the Committee on Finance. I think the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] was violently opposed to the amendment. After considerable discussion I think the committee was almost unanimous in insisting that the language remain in the bill as is. In other words, the Finance Committee almost unanimously turned down the amendment I proposed for a stamp tax.

Mr. REED. It would not have been unanimous unless the Senator from Michigan changed his vote.

Mr. COUZENS. I said almost unanimous. I did not change my mind although I was not particularly enthusiastic about whether my amendment was adopted or not. I submitted it because of the vigorous protest from the bankers.

Mr. REED. I was not present at that meeting.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have been in attendance at many of the Finance Committee meetings, but have had a good many conflicting meetings of other committees, and was not in attendance at that particular meeting of the Finance Committee when the check-tax matter was up for discussion.

May I say, with the permission of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that it seems to me that another advantage to be derived from the proposal as offered to the committee by the Senator from Michigan is that it calls the attention of the taxpayer to the fact that he is helping to bear a share of the Government expenses, whereas the measure as suggested by the Treasury Department conceals that fact from him unless he happens to notice it when he looks at his bank statement at the end of the month.

Mr. COUZENS. The Under Secretary of the Treasury also greatly influenced the committee, because he most vigorously opposed the amendment which I proposed. I know there was a large number of Senators there at the meeting, which statement the chairman will verify. I can not recall definitely who was there. I had no support for my amendment after the vigorous opposition expressed by the Under Secretary of the Treasury to the proposed stamp in lieu of the present method.

Mr. REED. I did not know there was such a meeting until the Senator told me to-day about it having been held. If I had been there. I would have shared the views of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I think there is no doubt that the committee considered the proposition from every angle, had both sides presented, and took a vote after the matter had been fully presented. It seems to me the bigger question involved is whether we are going to get the revenue rather than the way in which it is to be collected. That is a matter to be further considered in conference.

Mr. REED. I do not mean to prolong the discussion.

Mr. HARRISON. Will not the Senator let us get a vote on the main question?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. COPELAND. I hold in my hand now many letters and protests against this proposal. They come from small banks. It is not the large banks mentioned by the Senator from Wisconsin, but the small banks that have not the bookkeeping equipment which the larger banks have. They are the ones who deal with small checks. I think we should find a plan to relieve the banks of the unnecessary bookkeeping. I remember the Spanish War days. I found it quite comfortable and easy to use the stamp plan at that time, and I believe we can do it now with equal ease.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator for his suggestion. The important thing is getting the revenue, as is said by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. Upon that we have decided. I do not ask for any reversal of that decision, but I do think that the protests of the American Bankers' Association, the unanimous vote of the Bankers' Association of Pennsylvania, which was taken last week, and the protests we have had from every other State in the Union deserve some consideration. I agree with Senators that, having made a success of the stamp tax in the days of the Spanish War, we can make a success of it now.

Mr. President, without any further consumption of time on my part I send to the desk the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be reported for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 285, strike out lines 20 to 25, both inclusive, and on page 286, lines 1 to 19, both inclusive, and on page 281, after line 9, insert a new section to read as follows:

SEC. —. STAMP TAX ON CHECKS, ETC.

Schedule A of Title VIII of the revenue act of 1926 is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subdivision to read as follows:

"10. Checks, etc.: Check, draft, or order for the payment of money drawn upon any bank, banker, or trust company on or after the fifteenth day after the date of the enactment of the revenue act of 1932 and before July 1, 1934, 2 cents. Under regulations prescribed by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, the stamp may be imprinted upon any such instrument prior to the making or drawing thereof in such manner and under such conditions as will insure the payment of the tax. Every person authorized under such regulations to imprint such stamps shall reimburse the United States for the salaries of any stamp agents or stamp counters who may be designated to supervise such imprinting and for all expenses in connection with the preparation and furnishing of dies, plates, and other materials for such imprinting."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I wish to detain the Senate but a moment in speaking in opposition to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

In the first place, the matter was thoroughly discussed in committee. My recollection is there was a very representative attendance there and the committee voted almost unanimously in favor of the method reported by the committee.

Secondly, so far as the smaller banks are concerned, for which the Senator from New York has spoken briefly, I wish to say that it will be necessary for them to buy all of their checks from about seven or eight or nine lithographers in the United States who are in possession of the necessary machinery in order to emboss the Government stamp on the checks.

In the third place, if this method is pursued, when the tax goes out of effect at the end of two years the Government will have to redeem the stamps which are in existence at that time.

May I say that the appeal of the bankers against having the job of collecting the tax on behalf of the Government falls on deaf ears, so far as I am concerned. The Federal Government has gone to the rescue of the banks in the present situation, created the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, put the credit of the people of the United States behind the wobbling banks all over the country, loaning them money, bailing them out of difficulty. There has been no group in America that has yelled louder for balancing the Budget than have the bankers. Now, when we ask them to perform a service in collecting these taxes in an equitable and reasonable way, they ask to be relieved of that responsibility.

Mr. President, I hope the Senate will reject the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

PUBLIC WORKS PROGRAM

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask permission to have printed in the RECORD an editorial written by the distinguished American author, Walter Lippmann, entitled "A National Program," dealing with the bill which I have introduced providing for a public-works program.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TODAY AND TO-MORROW—A NATIONAL PROGRAM

By Walter Lippmann

The Wagner bill for relief and public works provides a golden opportunity for prompt national cooperation. The bill is a compromise among the various projects advanced by Mr. Young, Senator ROBINSON, Senator WAGNER himself, ex-Governor Smith, and the President. It is a self-respecting compromise which they can all accept without feeling that they have sacrificed seriously the essential principles for which they have been contending or that they have lost sight of their common aim.

On the main point at issue, the bill provides that three-quarters of the Federal credit to be pledged shall be devoted to self-liquidating projects. Of the remaining quarter, which is to be spent directly on public works, it can fairly be said that a part, such as that to be devoted to flood control and the Hoover Dam construction, represents a wise national investment, and another part, to be spent on public buildings to replace structures on which the Government pays rentals, may, if properly administered, represent a real saving of public money. When it is considered also that these five hundred millions for public works include one hundred and ninety-five millions which Congress would authorize anyway, the moderation of the Wagner bill is manifest. It is true that these public works are to be financed by borrowing, and not on the pay-as-you-go principle, but providing the Budget is otherwise brought into balance, the Government credit ought not to suffer at a time when the supply of liquid capital is so large.

Those who strain at this gnat will later be forced to swallow a camel.

The bill should be accepted in substance by the President for the administration and by Speaker GARNER for the Democrats in the House. It should be accepted by the financial community and by public opinion generally and Congress should enact it promptly without acrimonious debate, destructive amendments, filibustering, and all the other devices of confusion and delay. Each one of us will be making some concession on his pet theories, but this is no time to be finical and stubborn.

Apart from the merits of the bill itself, it can be said, I think, that the country would benefit more at this moment by a good demonstration of its capacity to agree on something than by anything else that could happen in Washington. What has been most disturbing to confidence in the last few months has been the increasing doubt as to whether the Government in Washington could govern. Here is a measure which provides relief and, in addition, honestly seeks to meet the public demand for positive action toward a resumption of work. It combines in an harmonious program the ideas of the principal leaders of both parties. If there is to be cooperation in this crisis, this is an excellent chance to cooperate; if there is to be leadership, this is an excellent opportunity to follow the leaders. In a democracy where nobody must expect to have things just as he would like them, the Wagner bill is as statesmanlike an adjustment of conflicting opinions as we are likely to see.

A prompt agreement on the principles of this bill will facilitate the main business of Congress. That business is to balance the Budget by drastic economies and adequate taxes. If the same spirit which animates this bill could be concentrated on the Budget problem, it would be an incalculable gain. The Wagner bill represents the ideas of men who have been sponsoring large programs of Federal relief and public works and also the ideas of men who have in the past opposed such programs. The same kind of agreement by open-minded concessions is needed on retrenchment and taxes.

At the present time this main business is submerged in a welter of plans, amendments, and votes. Why not lift the whole subject out of the confusion and simplify it? Let it be agreed that as to retrenchments there shall be a 15 per cent cut in all the appropriations, this saving to be made by cutting all salaries over $1,500 10 per cent and the remainder by such reorgaization and economies as the President may order; that as to taxes there shall be restored the war-time rates plus the manufacturers' sale tax.

A program of this sort is not too drastic if the Budget is really to be brought into balance. Its enactment would pinch and hurt everybody considerably. Nobody can possibly like the whole of it, but no program can be devised that everybody will like. The country is in a position where an adequate solution must be a painful solution. But though this program is painful, it would make the national credit secure, and the sacrifices which it would call for would help greatly to restore the national morale. To adopt it requires patriotism, a real willingness to make individual sacrifices for the common good. It would more than pay for itself, however, in the self-respect and self-confidence which the Nation would feel at having confronted its great problem and mastered it.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, MAY 27, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art the one divine Teacher in the art of good living, we approach Thy altar with praise and gratitude. Privileged as we are with opportunities for great helpfulness, may we not be disappointing to ourselves or to our fellow countrymen. Give us growing understanding to lay hold of great principles and apply them to urgent needs. In the performance of duty there come vexations and alienations, but, our Father, leave us not solitary. When we get the pang without the palm, keep us sweet, humble, and patient, and at all times true in the face of the ironies of life. Enlarge our natures, and yet subject their tendencies; preserve our hearts, and yet destroy their selfishness; control our wills, and yet sustain their courage. We pray in the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

APPROPRIATION FOR PAYMENT OF ARMY AND NAVY PENSIONS, FISCAL YEAR 1932

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution (H. J. Res. 407) and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the House joint resolution, as follows:

House Joint Resolution 407

Resolved, etc., That the sum of $12,750,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, for the payment of Army and Navy pensions, as follows: For invalids, widows, minor children, and dependent relatives, Army nurses, and all other pensioners who are now borne on the rolls, or who may hereafter be placed thereon, under the provisions of any and all acts of Congress: Provided, That the appropriation aforesaid for Navy pensions shall be paid from the income of the Navy pension fund so far as the same shall be sufficient for that purpose: Provided further, That the amount expended under each of the above items shall be accounted for separately.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, for the purpose of asking a question. This resolution provides the money shall come "from money not otherwise appropriated in the Treasury," and I want to ask the gentleman from Tennessee if there is any money still left in the Treasury that is "not otherwise appropriated."

Mr. BYRNS. It is hoped they will find some if this resolution is adopted.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I presume this has become necessary by reason of the failure of the appropriation bills to have been passed?

Mr. BYRNS. No; that situation has no relation to this resolution. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois and to the other Members of the House that this appropriation arises from two or three circumstances. In the first place, it is made necessary by what might be called an underestimate on the part of the bureau in not asking for enough to pay these pensions.

The gentleman will recall that Congress passed the act of June 2, 1930, increasing the pensions for Spanish-American War beneficiaries, which enlarged the charge upon the Government. The bureau was not in a position, when the estimate for 1932 appropriations was made, to say just how much money would be needed on account of the new act, and it was so stated in their hearings. They made the best estimate they could with a reservation that possibly an additional amount would be required before the year was up.

As the gentleman knows, this money is payable on June 4. There was a hearing before the deficiency subcommittee the other day—and this resolution is unanimously approved by that subcommittee—in which it appeared they have something like $7,000,000 on hand to pay their pensions due on June 4. It requires something over $19,000,000 for that purpose. Unless they get this appropriation by June 4 the gentleman will see what will be the result. It is impossible to put it into the deficiency bill, because it is very clear the deficiency bill will not become a law in time for that purpose.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. And these items are not carried in the regular appropriation bills?

Mr. BYRNS. Oh, no. This is a plain deficiency for this year which must be met on June 4, and this is the exact amount that is needed.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Are any of these items carried in continuing appropriations?

Mr. BYRNS. No, sir.

Mr. MICHENER. Reserving the right to object, without this legislation these pensions could not be paid on June 4?

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. MICHENER. It is really a deficiency appropriation?

Mr. BYRNS. Exactly, and offered at this time because it is apparent that the deficiency bill, which otherwise would contain it, can not become a law in time to meet these payments.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. DYER. Is this the result of any legislation enacted by the present Congress, making necessary this additional appropriation?

Mr. BYRNS. I do not understand the gentleman.

Mr. DYER. Is this request for additional money for the payment of pensions, due in any way to any legislation enacted by the present Congress?

Mr. BYRNS. No. As I said to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM], this is due in the first place to an error in making their estimates arising from the act of June 2, 1930, increasing the pensions of Spanish-American War beneficiaries; and in addition to that, $2,000,000 of the amount that was carried in the fiscal year 1932 appropriation was made immediately available and had to be used in the fiscal year 1931.

Mr. DYER. In other words, the American people can not complain of the action of this Congress in appropriating additional money on account of any legislation that we have enacted at this Congress?

Mr. BYRNS. Not at all.

Mr. DYER. It is the result of a deficiency under existing law passed by a previous Congress?

Mr. BYRNS. The gentleman is entirely correct.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I yield.

Mr. UNDERHILL. It is a result of this increase which Congress passed over the President's veto, the Spanish-American War pension bill of $60,000,000?

Mr. BYRNS. Well, yes. That, of course, is involved.

Mr. MICHENER. This is a fixed charge?

Mr. BYRNS. This is a fixed charge, and the exact amount that we are told will be needed by the responsible authorities.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

THE MORNING AFTER THE SPENDING SPREE

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD some remarks of my own delivered over the radio some weeks ago, but which on account of recent developments have now become timely

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following remarks made by me over the radio on April 5, 1932. Recent developments made these remarks quite as timely as when originally delivered.

The State and local governments in this country have been on a spending spree during the last few years. Their expenses have been increasing at about the rate of 20 per cent a year.

There is not time now to go into the causes. Some of these increased expenses were necessary. Many were not. It is true, however, that both State and local governments have multiplied bureaus and have assumed new duties that a few years ago were considered wholly foreign to the functions of States or municipalities. Hundreds of thousands have been added to the public pay rolls. Many of our municipalities and some of our States have been loosely governed. In some cases they have been corruptly governed.

In all cases the tremendous increase in public expenditures has been going on apparently in the belief that more taxes were available, and if they were not, the city or the county or the State could borrow money on a new bond issue.

In an attempt to meet these expenses, State and local taxes have more than doubled since the World War. To-day the average State and local taxes for the entire United States is $83 for every man, woman, and child. In some places it is far higher than this. In others, of course, it is less. Let us now face the fact that the burden of these increased taxes fall upon all. It should be emphasized that no one escapes. The city property owner, the farmer, the business concern, the factory, and the railroad pay directly. The individual who owns no property and is engaged in no business pays it by increased rent bills, grocery bills, clothing bills, and every other item of expenditure. He pays also through the medium of gasoline taxes, motor-car-license tax, and the like.

Notwithstanding this tremendous increase in State and local taxation during the last 10 years, it has lacked $1,000,000,000 a year of being enough to meet expenses. In other words, the public debt of school districts, cities, county governments, and State governments has been increasing at the rate of $1,000,000,000 a year, until to-day their combined bonded indebtedness reaches the astounding figure of $13,000,000,000. The public is paying $1,500,000,000 interest on this debt every year, and over $1,000,000,000 a year to provide a sinking fund.

Communities which have been making financial whoopee are now realizing that it was an expensive pastime. Their credit has been exhausted. They can no longer borrow money. Neither can they raise more taxes, for they are face to face with public revolt not only against higher taxes but a determination upon the part of the taxpayers that there must be a marked reduction in public expenditures. The day of reckoning has arrived. The spree is over. This is the cold, gray dawn of the morning after.

Meantime, the United States Government has decreased its public debt $8,000,000,000, and its expenditures have decreased $2.47 per capita since 1922. As a result, the credit of the United States Government is the highest of any government in the world and its per capita taxes are still the lowest.

Now comes the proposal, apparently serious, that these spendthrift municipalities be freshly financed by the Federal Government so that the political machines that have bankrupted the cities may continue in power to plunder and squander. The argument is now seriously advanced by outstanding Democratic leaders that the splendid fight of local taxpayers now being waged against extravagance and mismanagement be thwarted by the United States using its credit to borrow money with which to purchase municipal public-works bonds, thereby heaping so much more debt and interest charges upon the backs of the already overburdened municipal taxpayers. If this is not the purpose, then the proposal is dishonest in that, concealed behind it, is a scheme to saddle upon the Federal Government and Federal taxpayers the increasing expenses of cities which, by reason of past extravagance, are no longer able to finance themselves.

Another proposal is to have the Federal Government issue what are falsely termed "prosperity bonds" to the amount of $5,000,000,000, the proceeds from which are to be used in the construction of public works throughout the United States.

There is no pretense that this extraordinary construction would be needed in order to house the activities of the Federal Government. It is a plain, palpable proposition to have the United States embark upon a financial career as wildly extravagant as has marked the careers of the States and municipalities which are now out of money and out of credit.

It is a proposition to have the Federal Government spend billions of dollars constructing public highways that nobody needs and which are of no public commercial value, constructing public buildings for which the Government has no need, improving so-called rivers that have no commerce and would never float a boat, and constructing harbors in which no vessels would ever anchor.

I regard this as the most audacious, as well as the most stupendous, "pork-barrel" proposal to raid the Public Treasury that has ever been made. Such an issue would not be "prosperity bonds." They would be calamity bonds. Dumping $5,000,000,000 of bonds on the market, even during the height of prosperity, would have broken the price of every outstanding security. Even during the World War, under stress of national defense and the stimulus of patriotism, but one bond issue was in excess of $5,000,000,000.

Not only would such a bond issue break the prices of all outstanding securities and run up interest charges on the Government but it would suck from productive enterprises the money now sorely needed to finance agriculture, industry, commerce, and transportation.

I bring you no new information when I say that the people of this Nation are aroused to the menace of public extravagance and to the urgent necessity of getting back to the old-fashioned principles of economy in public affairs. Only last week, for example, it was announced by a Middle West tax conference that 700 cities were organizing to fight for a reduction in public expenditures, and that they would be assisted by more than 2,000 Rotary clubs.

To you taxpayers who are enlisting in this movement and who are listening in to-night, may I send this message:

Stand by your guns in the fight for public economy, for reduced public expenditures, for an end to public extravagance.

Your President has already declared war all along the line on unnecessary public expenditures. He began to admonish Congress as early as December, 1930, of the necessity of reducing the expenses of the Federal Government. He has consistently prosecuted a campaign for economy in Federal affairs ever since, and it is only a plain statement of what the record shows to assert that in this campaign he has met with the determined opposition and the violent criticism of Democratic leaders in both branches of Congress, up to this very day. During the last 24 hours the President sent an urgent message to Congress asking that the two political parties cooperate with the executive branch of the Government in order that economies amounting to over $200,000,000 might be worked out. The President accompanied his suggestion with a detailed outline of methods whereby, by amending laws, this could be done. What was the response? Your papers of to-day furnish you the answer, namely, that Democratic leaders in both branches of Congress denounced the President's proposal.

In conclusion, may I commend to you the advice and the warning of President Hoover, who, in January last, issued a statement to the American people in which he said:

"I wish to emphasize to the full extent of my ability the necessity, as a fundamental of recovery, the utmost economy of governmental expenditure of all kinds. Our people must realize that government can not continue to live in a depression upon the scale that was possible in times of great prosperity. * * * Rigid economy is a real road to relief, to home owners, farmers, workers, and every element of our population. * * * Our first duty as a nation is to put our governmental house in order, national, State, and local. With the return of prosperity the Government can undertake constructive projects, both of social character and in public improvement, but we can not squander ourselves into prosperity."

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, the attention of the Members of the House is called to a proposed amendment to the Constitution, which I have introduced, as follows:

That in lieu of Article V of the Constitution of the United States the following be proposed as an amendment to the Constitution, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States:

"The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution when ratified by the people of three-fourths of the several States, the electors of which shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State legislatures."

Article V of the Federal Constitution provides only two ways to initiate amendments. (1) Direct proposal by the Congress to the legislatures of the several States and (2) proposal by a convention called on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the States.

To become a part of the Constitution, amendments must be ratified (1) by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States or (2) by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as one or the other mode may be proposed by Congress. No other method is provided. Ratification by the legislatures of the several States has been followed since the Constitution was adopted. The convention method has never been invoked owing to the great expense for the nomination, election, pay, and mileage of the members, lack of machinery and to the fact that conventions rarely register the will of the people.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] pointed out in the RECORD, March 5, 1932, some of the evils of the legislative method. The Members are not elected on the issue that may be involved by a proposed amendment, and are therefore without any specific mandate from their constituencies. They are swayed in their decisions by the active work and propaganda of organized minorities. The fate of the Constitution is left in the hands of a few, and, oftentimes, any proposal of change receives little or no real consideration.

The convention system is even less desirable. In many States the delegates would be designated by party bosses and chosen by a comparatively few voters. Conventions generally represent the will of the bosses, not the will of the people. Leaders, seeking party advantage, would dictate vital decisions. It has been pointed out that the convention method permits the people to vote only for delegates. They should be permitted to vote on the policies involved.

The convention system was discarded from the day of the adoption of the Constitution as an unworkable and impossible provision for ratification of amendments to that immortal document.

I believe the people should have the right to vote direct on any fundamental changes in the Constitution. In my State the constitutional convention system was discarded as obsolete in 1870 and since that time amendments to the State constitution have been ratified by direct vote. If the people can be trusted to vote direct on amendments to the State constitution, they can be trusted to vote on changes to the Constitution of their country.

The proposal would afford a direct vote by the people on every amendment. It would offer a direct vote on a resubmission of the eighteenth amendment. It would give effect to the basic principle upon which our Government rests. The people formed this Government. Let us have a vote on policies by all the people, not a vote by a few of the people.

I trust this amendment may receive consideration by the Judiciary Committee of the House and by the Congress at this session so it may go to the legislatures for action. The legislatures of three-fourths of the States would, I believe, act promptly and favorably.

GUARANTY FUND FOR BANK DEPOSITS

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11362) to amend the national banking act and the Federal reserve act, and to provide a guaranty fund for depositors in banks.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11362), with Mr. WOODRUM in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. Section 5151 of the Revised Statutes and section 23 of the Federal reserve act (relating to liability of shareholders of national banking associations) (U. S. C., title 12, secs. 63, 64) are amended by striking out the words "in addition to the amount invested in such shares" wherever they appear.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Cox: Page 7, beginning in line 1, strike out all of section 3.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. STEVENSON. Before the gentleman speaks, I may state on behalf of the committee we have no objection to the amendment.

I do not mean to cut the gentleman off from speaking at this time.

Mr. COX. I have no desire to discuss the amendment. I may say, however, that with this amendment accepted and the committee accepting the amendments which the gentlemen handling the legislation have indicated they will offer, my objections to the bill, in the main, will have been removed.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. COX. Certainly.

Mr. STEAGALL. I will say to the gentleman it is highly agreeable to the committee to accept an amendment which accomplishes the identical purpose the gentleman has in mind, namely, to permit all State banks to participate in the protection fund upon the payment of the same assessment charge that is to be borne by the member banks of the Federal reserve system having the same deposits.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, my objections to the legislation are largely because of discriminations I find in the bill against State banks. With the acceptance of this amendment and the adoption of the amendments the gentleman has indicated he and others would offer, I do not think the bill is subject to those objections any longer, and therefore it may be my pleasure to give it my support, although I reserve the right to vote for other amendments.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman kindly state the nature of his amendment? Tell us what it is.

Mr. COX. Section 3 of the bill relieves national banks or the stockholders of national banks that may be organized after the bill becomes law of double liability on stocks.

In other words, my objection to that provision of the bill is due to the preferential treatment to be accorded the owners of stock in national banks, whereas in most of the States the banking laws contain a provision imposing double liability on stock. If this particular section of the bill should be adopted, it would have the effect, first, of bringing about a hurried reorganization of national banks in order that stockholders might be relieved of the liability which is now imposed upon them by existing law.

Mr. EATON of New Jersey. The gentleman's amendment proposes to strike out this provision?

Mr. COX. My amendment proposes to strike out this provision and leave the owners of stock in State and National banks upon the same footing as they now are.

Mr. EATON of New Jersey. And the committee has agreed to the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. COX. The committee has agreed to the amendment.

Mr. GARBER. Does not the gentleman think the constructive provision of the committee really meets conditions as they are and tends to encourage the investment of outside capital in the organization and operation of these banks?

Mr. COX. The effect of this provision would be to kill off all interest in the stock of State banks, because no one can own such stocks without being subject to the double-liability clause of the law.

Mr. GARBER. And the gentleman is sacrificing the benefits of this provision in order to place the banks on an equality?

Mr. COX. I do not consider this is a virtue.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WILLLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire recognition in opposition to the amendment.

My intention was to offer an amendment to this section by striking out the section and offering a substitute. I am not just certain where I would be left if the gentleman's amendment to strike out the section is adopted.

I want to strike out the section and offer a substitute for it. My intention is to offer a new section 3 as a substitute for the present section. I think this is a preferential motion to the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer a substitute?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a preferential amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute amendment offered by Mr. WILLIAMSON: On page 7, strike out all of section 3 and insert a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 3. Section 5151 Revised Statutes and section 23 Federal reserve act (relating to liability of shareholders of national banking associations) (U. S. C., Title XII, sec. 6364) are amended by striking out the words in the second paragraph, 'sixty days,' and inserting in lieu thereof 'one year.'"

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment will be apparent at once to members of the Banking and Currency Committee who are familiar with the Federal reserve act. The striking out of section 3 as it now appears has the result, of course, of striking out the provision in the bill which would repeal that part of the Federal reserve act dealing with double liability, which now exists as to all stockholders in national banks in the Federal reserve system. This double liability clearly should be retained in the interest of sound banking. My amendment not only does that, but it amends section 23 of the Federal reserve act, which now provides that the double liability upon national bank stock shares shall continue for a period of 60 days after the sale of such shares, in the event the national bank in which such shares are held should be closed within the 60-day period. I am extending that 60-day period to one year, so that the double liability of stockholders will continue for a period of one year after sale and transfer of stock.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Does the gentleman interpret the present law to be that it does away with the double liability of stockholders after 60 days?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes. That is the present law. The present law does away with the double liability of stockholders after 60 days, that is, the liability continues for only 60 days after the transfer of stock, and I want to extend the time of that liability to one year. The purpose of the amendment is to prevent stockholders who know that their bank is apt to be closed from transferring their stock to dummies and thereby escape liability. Under the present law we have realized very little upon the double liability of stockholders of closed national banks. If that liability is extended to cover one year after sale, I think we can very greatly enlarge the recoveries in the future as compared with past years.

Mr. McKEOWN. I know of one case where not a single stockholder was able to respond to anything.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. That is a very common thing.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes.

Mr. COX. I will state to the gentleman that in practice they are able to reach cases where the stock had been transferred for more than 12 months prior to the failure of the bank. In other words, if they could show that a stockholder had notice of the insolvency of a bank, the 60-day period would not give relief against liability.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. That is quite true; but, as a matter of fact, the past history of closed national banks shows that we have collected only about 16 per cent on the double liability of stockholders. One reason for that is the transfer of stock to irresponsible persons. I am very confident that a great many of those who now escape by the transfer of their stock would be called upon to respond if the period were made one year.

Mr. COX. I think the gentleman is right in the main, but the difficulty is that would put a restraint upon the sale of stock in perfectly solvent institutions.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I do not think it would do that. What difference does it make, if an institution is solvent, whether a man's liability continues for one year after the sale of stock or not? I do not think it would affect any proper transfer of stock; on the other hand, I am confident it would result in a very much larger collection from the stockholders of closed national banks.

Mr. COX. Would the gentleman consider changing the time from 12 months to 6 months?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I would rather not do that. I would much prefer 12 months.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman acquainted with the case of the American National Bank, one of the large banks of Detroit, which failed through the cupidity of the head officials and wherein the stockholders will be held for contributions to the extent of hundreds of thousands of dollars? This double liability is in effect in Canada and in every State, so why should we now remove it?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. My amendment does not remove the double liability. I am striking out the part of the bill which removes the double liability. My amendment continues the double liability and increases the time it continues after sale of stock—which is now 60 days—to one year.

Mr. STEAGALL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes.

Mr. STEAGALL. I will say to the gentleman that if we are to undertake to preserve the double-liability feature of the national banking law and make it effective the gentleman's amendment is calculated to strengthen that provision of the law. Therefore I shall be glad, and I feel the committee will be glad, to accept the gentleman's substitute.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. I yield.

Mr. KELLER. If the deposits are guaranteed, will it make any difference whether a man is in for double liability or not?

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Oh, it will make a whole lot of difference, because it will mean that much less of a draft upon the guaranty fund.

Mr. STAFFORD. And also upon the taxpayers of the country, as well as the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Yes.

Later I shall offer an amendment to section 208, if opportunity permits, with a view to permitting State banks to come in under the guaranty upon the same basis as member banks of the Federal reserve system. Should the bill be enacted into law without this being done, it would result in closing most of our State banks. It is clear that State banks can not survive on the side of banks whose deposits are guaranteed. There are more banks outside the Federal reserve system than in it. These banks are entitled to the same consideration and should not be excluded by the impossible requirements now contained in section 208. The amendments I propose to offer, if adopted, will permit State banks to take advantage of the law upon equal terms with member banks. This is a prime requisite to a successful working of the system. Without it disaster will follow the enactment of the law.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from South Dakota.

The substitute amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended by the substitute, was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. The provisions of sections 1, 2, and 3 of this act shall apply only to national banking associations organized after the date of enactment of this act, and the provisions of law amended by such sections shall apply to all other national banking associations as if such sections had not been enacted.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

What is really purposed by the phraseology of this section, particularly the last half—

And the provisions of law amended by such sections shall apply to all other national banking associations as if such sections had not been enacted.

This is rather ambiguous to my, perhaps, obtuse mind.

Mr. STEAGALL. The provision of section 3 was to abolish existing law providing for assessment against stockholders of an amount equal to their stock in case of insolvency of a bank. This provision, however, was to apply only to banks hereafter organized. So to make it clear that the new provision did not in any way set aside obligations that exist under present law, the language was written into the section which the gentleman has just read.

Mr. STAFFORD. The committee has just adopted the Williamson amendment, wherein it is sought to hold to the rule of double liability in case of those who by a subterfuge transfer their stock to dummies. I should assume the purpose now is to not only apply section 3 to those associations that are formed hereafter, but that it should apply to all national banking associations.

Mr. STEAGALL. I think, perhaps, the gentleman is technically correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. More than technically—absolutely correct.

Mr. STEAGALL. I do not think it would do any harm whatsoever to leave the language as it is, but it is perhaps more lawyerlike to strike out the figure "3" and the word "and," and I therefore ask unanimous consent that the figure "3" and the word "and," in line 7, of section 4, be stricken out and that the word "and" be inserted between the figures 1 and 2.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am sure the membership has been impressed by the propaganda against this bill, which is not only in the press but propaganda that is coming to my desk and to your desks.

I can not understand why there should be any interest in the United States that would be against protecting honest depositors in banks.

This is the same kind of propaganda you see in the press this morning—and, by the way, it is mostly the Hearst press—that says that the membership in the House has changed its position on the sales tax. Where is there a Member of this House who has changed his position on the sales tax? I pause for any such Member to arise and make himself known. Is there such a Member here? Not one. And the press ought to report that there has been no such change in the House.

I want our Senators from the State of Texas to understand that there are not any changes here in the House of the Members who fought and defeated the sales tax proposition. I have talked to the membership that honestly and conscientiously opposed that proposed vicious policy in the bill and I have not been able to find any changes. The membership of the House is standing pat against the sales tax, and it is a futile thing for certain Senators over in the other body to try to put that provision back in the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. (a) The second sentence of the first paragraph of section 7 of the Federal reserve act (U. S. C., title 12, sec. 289) is amended to read as follows: "After the aforesaid dividend claims have been fully met, 10 per cent of the net earnings of such bank shall be paid into the surplus. One-half of the remainder of the net earnings shall be paid into the Federal guaranty fund for depositors in member banks of the Federal reserve system, and the remaining one-half shall be paid to the member banks of the Federal reserve system, of which amount each such bank shall be paid an amount which bears the same ratio to the amount of such remaining one-half as the paid-in capital stock owned by stockholders in such member bank bears to the total paid-in capital stock owned by all stockholders in all member banks of such Federal reserve bank."

(b) The first sentence of the second paragraph of section 7 of the Federal reserve act is repealed.

(c) The second sentence of the second paragraph of section 7 of the Federal reserve act is amended to read as follows: "Should a Federal reserve bank be dissolved or go into liquidation, any surplus remaining, after the payment of all debts, dividend requirements as hereinbefore provided, and the par value of the stock, shall, in the discretion of the Secretary, be used to supplement the gold reserve held against outstanding United States notes, or shall be applied to the reduction of the outstanding bonded indebtedness of the United States under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 7, beginning on line 13, strike out all of section 5 down to and including line 15, on page 8.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment strikes out the first provision of a section in this bill proposing to guarantee deposits in banks. A little later on I will offer another amendment, which will have for its purpose the elimination of other features pertaining to the guaranty deposits in banks.

I have no particular objection to the sections in the bill which we have already passed over. They are probably in proper form and should be passed, but, so far as the provisions are concerned in this bill guaranteeing deposits, I am very much opposed to it, and my purpose is to take the first step in their elimination.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. The new language is a good provision to put into the law, even though we strike out the rest of it commencing at line 18 on page 7.

Mr. McFADDEN. There is a provision in the law now which covers that satisfactorily.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HOWARD. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment striking out the provision for the maintenance of the guarantee fund. That guarantee fund is to be maintained by 45 per cent of the earnings of the Federal reserve banks. The provision is that after paying 6 per cent dividends the member banks are entitled to, then the surplus is to be divided as follows: Ten per cent is to go to the surplus, and that leaves 90 per cent to be divided, and one half of that goes to the guarantee fund and the other half is distributed as dividends to the member banks who own the stock in these institutions.

The gentleman from Texas has iterated and reiterated that the fund should belong to the United States Government, because the United States Government authorizes the banks to issue the money on its credit.

The gentleman from Texas is mistaken in his allegation of facts. The old controversy that raged while the gentleman was in his kilts was on the objection to the national banks issuing money, and it raged all through the nineties in that horrible panic that we were in—and I went through it—and the question was, when we come to establish the Federal banks, whether they should have the right to issue money.

The absolute position of the majority of the people who were promoting the institution of the banks was against any more issues of currency resulted in its being determined that only the Government should issue the money, and it should be the money of the Government.

It is the money of the Government. How do they get it? Why this talk about this being the issue by the Federal reserve bank? It is an error. The Federal reserve bank can get the money from whom? From the agent of the United States Government who is charged with the duty of surrendering 100 per cent of the money issued in commercial paper, and requiring the banks to keep a reserve of 40 per cent in gold against it.

Any Federal reserve bank may make application to the local Federal reserve agent for such amount of the Federal reserve notes hereinbefore provided for as it may require. Such applications shall be accompanied with a tender to the local Federal reserve agent of collateral in amount equal to the sum of the Federal reserve notes thus applied for and issued pursuant to such application. The collateral security thus offered shall be notes and bills accepted for rediscount under the provisions of section 13 of this act, and the Federal reserve agent shall each day notify the Federal Reserve Board of all issues and withdrawals of Federal reserve notes to and by the Federal reserve bank to which he is accredited. The said Federal Reserve Board may at any time call upon a Federal reserve bank for additional security to protect the Federal reserve notes issued to it.

So that when the Federal reserve bank wants money issued it has to go to the agent of the United States and put up 100 per cent of acceptable commercial paper, and we have now said that they can put it up in United States bonds. What further is to be done?

Every Federal reserve bank shall maintain reserves in gold or lawful money of not less than 35 per cent against its deposits and reserves in gold of not less than 40 per cent against its Federal reserve notes in actual circulation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, therefore the United States issues the money, and it requires the Federal reserve bank to put up 100 per cent of commercial paper, acceptable and eligible, and 40 per cent in gold to secure it. That is the situation under which that money is issued.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. That is true, of course; but the money is issued under the Federal reserve system, and the Federal reserve system is permitted to use that money and make earnings on it; and if this law goes through, it simply means that they will pay no further franchise to the Government or anything for the privilege.

Mr. STEVENSON. That may be, but it does not make the Government the owner of the money. The Government has absolute security for the money issued, and so much so that they require a gold-settlement fund, which amounts to a great many million dollars in gold, to be kept in the Treasury down here with which to redeem any notes that were presented for redemption.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEVENSON. I can not yield further. So that we have here a situation in which the banks furnish the collateral upon which the money is issued by the Government. The bankers are the people who furnish the capital, which is crystallized into those securities, and the depositors are the people who furnish the money upon which the reserves are based, which the Federal reserve banks are operating upon. If there is anybody that has any equity in that, the people who own the deposits upon which every dollar that the Federal reserve banks have, except capital stock is based, are entitled to some consideration; and when we provide a guaranty fund for them so that they can get their money, there is no better place to look for it than to look for it among the fruits of the money which they have furnished, which they have put into the banks of the country, 7 per cent of which is put in Federal reserve banks, and amounts to more than $2,000,000,000 for a reserve, which the banks are required to carry. It is the direct fruit of the deposits of this country, and the matter of taking the surplus away from all of it going into the Treasury and giving it to a fund which will make sure the deposits upon which the whole business is based is not the taking of the money of the United States, and certainly is not depleting the credit of the United States, as some other things that are being agitated are doing at this very good hour. [Applause.]

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN], the ultimate purpose of which is to remove from this proposed legislation the proposals for the guaranty of bank deposits. Yesterday the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] called upon the Members of the House who are interested in balancing the Budget to express themselves upon this legislation. I sought recognition immediately after the gentleman had finished, but was unable to get it at the time.

I rise now to say that in my opinion the Members of the House and of this Committee of the Whole are making a serious mistake in proposing all kinds of legislation which necessarily will more or less further agitate the present disturbed condition of the country. We have before us one main objective—that is, to balance the Budget of the United States in two ways, first, by reducing expenditures to the greatest extent possible, and, second, by passing a sane, reasonable tax law. Are we contributing to that purpose by the passage of this legislation? Right here, in section 5, is the beginning of the encroachment, I will say the raid, on the Federal Treasury for the purpose of guaranteeing bank deposits. After the dividend claims have been paid 10 per cent of the net earnings of the bank under this proposal shall be paid into the surplus and one-half of that shall be paid into the guaranty funds. At the present time those net earnings are paid into the United States Treasury as a franchise tax, after the surplus fund has received an amount equal to 100 per cent of the subscribed capital stock. This bill provides for taking $150,000,000 of the money now accumulated out of net earnings in the Treasury of the United States for the guaranty fund and the application to this fund of another $150,000,000 out of the surplus of the Federal reserve banks, and it provides further for the immediate provision for the guaranty fund of $500,000,000 of the assets of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which it is said shall be in the nature of a loan. What guaranty is there that this advancement will be merely a loan?

What guarantee is there that the $500,000,000 plus the two sums of $150,000,000 each will not be a direct contribution out of the Treasury of the United States to guarantee deposits in banks whose management, control, and operation will not be under the Federal Government except in a very indirect and in a very ineffective manner?

Mr. Chairman, we are whittling away our time. Instead of devoting our energies to the great objective which alone will accomplish results for the recovery from our depression, we are passing bills every day which go further toward disturbing the confidence of the people. This bill will disturb the confidence of the people not only as to the solvency of the Treasury of the United States by reason of the withdrawal of funds from it, but because of the further injection of the Federal Government into business operations on the part of persons over whom we have no real control.

What price will there be upon efficiency, ability, integrity, and honesty in the conduct of banks, if the managers of those banks, the directors and officers, are to be protected against their defalcations, against their mismanagement and against their fraudulent operations, by a fund which, at least in the first instance, is provided out of the Federal Treasury?

We ourselves are suffering from the hysteria of which we have heard complaint on the floor of the House. Many Members have complained because the people back home are finding fault with Congress for having lost its sense of proportion and its sense of duty at the present moment.

We are justifying those complaints by just such legislation at the present time. We are falling into our own trap.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. In our anxiety to try to do something to relieve the present unfortunate condition of the country we are passing one piece of ill-advised legislation after another. I am sorry I had to disagree with most of the Members of this House, as I did, for instance, in the passage of the Goldsborough bill, and other legislation that the House has adopted recently. I think this Congress will accomplish the best for the people of this Nation, this Congress will do best toward recovery from the depression from which we are all suffering, if we will simply devote ourselves to that one great thing of balancing the Budget of the United States, and of demonstrating that we propose that the Treasury of the United States shall remain intact and unimpaired, and that the Treasury of the United States shall continue as solvent as it always has been in the past. [Applause.]

We are not going to accomplish anything toward recovery by taking $650,000,000 or $800,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States, and saying to the people of the country, "We will merely use this money temporarily to protect depositors in certain banks, who happen to come under the provisions of this bill." We are not going to add anything to the movement toward recovery from business depression by passing legislation which seeks only to take money out of the Treasury and which ought to be considered quietly and sanely, under more favorable conditions.

These hectic, hysterical times of universal despondency and despair are not the period for the Congress to pass experimental legislation of this sort and place the resources of the Government available for the protection, if you please, of private enterprise and private business. It means, after all, that the Government is going still further into the banking business. The other day somebody introduced a resolution, and the majority sought to have it passed without objection, for the appointment of a committee that shall investigate the extent and purpose for which the Federal Government is engaging in private business. This is another embarkation into private business, and it is a hazardous undertaking on which we are starting at a time when we ought to be engaged in more serious business than all of this experimentation. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, under leave to extend my remarks, let me add that, in my opinion, this legislation involves the whole relation of the Federal Government to the entire banking structure of the country. The time has not yet arrived, when either in law or in fact, as stated by the committee report on this bill, "our banking structure is one building." It is true that the same economic conditions affect all banks, whether Federal or State, large or small.

That is an argument for unified control, for a single system under which all banking institutions would be established and maintained. The existence of such a system might help to safeguard deposits and depositors. But such a system is not yet in these United States. We do not even have a "central bank" in the real sense of the term. We are trying to achieve results before we establish a system or an institution through which they may be attained. We are trying to manufacture without machinery; to protect private interests without controlling the forces that handle those interests. We are forgetting the human element in all of these transactions. Business can not operate in strait-jackets; credits can not be extended, limited, or expanded by legislative enactment. Particularly and especially, public money, collected in the last analysis only through taxation, should not be used to embark business upon new experiments or untried policies. Finally, if we must do these things or, perforce, must attempt to do them, let us await the calmer consideration and wiser judgment of a better day.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] admittedly goes to the very heart of this bill. As I understand many of the other provisions of the bill, they are merely ancillary to the main proposition of undertaking to set up a system of Government guaranties for the depositors in State banks, so that this question now presented to the committee, and the one which the gentleman has indicated he would follow with a subsequent motion, is really a decisive test of the sentiment of this committee as to whether or not we favor the essential features of this bill.

In my opinion, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] is far beside the mark when he takes the position that the only essential thing that the Congress of the United States ought to do before it adjourns is to balance the Budget and pass the appropriation bills. The Chief Executive of this country time after time within the last few weeks and months has given out official and quasi-official statements to the effect that the great thing required in this country to-day to restore prosperity is to restore confidence upon the part of the people in their business institutions. One of the things that is to-day paralyzing the economic channels of trade and business is lack of confidence.

The one great disturbing factor that is to-day pressing down upon the business activities of our people, and incidentally, in my opinion, one of the great obstacles to a return to at least some semblance of business activity, is fear upon the part of the people of this country, not only on the part of men of means, men of present assets, but all other classes of the people. They do not know what the future holds in store for them; and what little assets they have left they are nursing almost with the timidity of a miser because of that fear—fear of insolvency of banks, fear of insolvency of any immediate investment, of any step that is calculated to restore prosperity. One of the great fears, the preponderant fear of the people in my opinion, is fear about the safety and solvency of our financial institutions. This is one of the great things that is causing hoarding upon the part of individuals and causing hoarding upon the part of the banks themselves, and they are the chief offenders in that respect, in my opinion.

What does the bill do? Admittedly, it is in the nature of an experiment. The Congress of the United States has not heretofore ventured into the field of guaranty of bank deposits, and for a great number of years we were fearful to venture upon the experiment of the great Federal reserve system to regulate the financial institutions of the country. Finally, however, we were bold enough, and courageous enough, and wise enough, to institute that great system. I want to tell you, Mr. Chairman, we have fallen upon times when we have got to burn a good many of our bridges in this country upon some of our old, original conceptions of our public institutions. [Applause.] And here, in my opinion, is an opportunity for the Congress of the United States to say that the people of this country who deposit the fruits of their labor and of their toil and of their saving in the banking institutions of the country ought to have some reasonable assurance, or insurance, if it is possible to work it out upon a sane and wise policy, that when they put those deposits in the bank should they require them they can get those deposits back.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama may have five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I tried to listen to the debate on the bill as far as I could, and I tried to read the debate on the bill as far as I could to see if there were really sound, fundamental objections proposed to the heart of the bill, the guaranty system.

Most of the arguments that have been made, Mr. Chairman, have been predicated upon the proposition that we had in the limited sphere of State guaranties tried this experiment, and these experiments there had failed. Of course, this is a reason to offer and it is a legitimate reason, but let us look at the facts in connection with the failure of those State institutions. There are gentlemen here before me representing States where the experiment has been tried, and I think they will bear me out that the reason those State experiments failed was because of the absence of an adequate reserve fund of money, a sufficient supply of money coupled up, of course, with some political maneuvering, and with some bad banking practices; but the real cause of the collapse of those institutions was not any unsoundness in the theory of the insurance proposition, but because adequate machinery was not provided for its successful operation.

Mr. EATON of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. For a brief question.

Mr. EATON of New Jersey. I wish to ask two questions.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not yield for two questions.

Mr. EATON of New Jersey. Then I will combine them into one question. What is the theory upon which this proposed guaranty is to be enacted? Is it the theory of insurance? If it is, why should not the depositors pay for their own insurance the same as they do for insurance on their houses?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is upon the theory, broadly speaking, of insurance, of course, but I will ask my friend, the gentleman from New Jersey, has the theory of insurance with reference to other business organizations in this country failed?

Mr. EATON of New Jersey. No; but they pay for it themselves.

Mr. BANKHEAD. They have succeeded. Of course, the risks have got to be paid for. As set up in this bill, the depositors themselves, in the last analysis, are guaranteeing this fund, or participating in it; and that is the very heart and kernel, as I see it, of this whole proposition.

The gentleman asks what the theory is. In my opinion, the theory is that of common honesty. Banking institutions were not established under our theory of government just to give some individual an opportunity to make private gains for himself. The theory upon which they are chartered is that they are to perform some quasi-public or public function; that they are to be a source of credit for the operation of business enterprises, so that men will not have to carry cash in their pockets to transact all of their business; and the people who put money in those institutions have a right to expect and demand they will get it back whenever they want it.

In the last 10 years $1,155,000,000 of the labor, sweat, and toil of the American people has gone down in these failing institutions, and they have been deprived of it simply because the genius of the American Congress and its courageous experimentation have not reached the point, which I trust they have now reached, of setting up a system that will prevent in the future any such experience as those through which we have gone in the last 10 years. These are the purposes of the bill.

Wherein has the unsoundness of the theory of insurance been pointed out to you? The gentleman says this is no time to disturb business conditions. My God! The business conditions of America to-day are absolutely paralyzed and destroyed. In my opinion, if Congress would pass this bill and if the President of the United States would sign it to-morrow you would see breaking out all over this country absolute impulses of confidence in our institutions, and people would begin to go back to the banks saying, "The Federal Government has thrown its protecting arm around the humble depositors, and we will go back to the banks." [Applause.] The bank deposits will be enlarged. Hoardings will be withdrawn from hiding places to be put back into the channels of trade. In my opinion it would be an influential step toward the restoration of the confidence which is so greatly needed in this country.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WIGGLESWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania because I am sincerely opposed to the proposed guaranty of deposits in specified banks, which is the heart of the bill now under consideration. I am opposed to it because, in my judgment, it is unsound in principle, undesirable in its effect on the financial structure of the Nation, unable as a practical matter to bring about the result that it purports to assure, and unfair in its representation to the country as a whole.

The proposed guaranty is unsound in principle, in my judgment, because it proposes, with the aid of the Federal Government, to guarantee deposits in all banks specified, regardless of management. It makes no distinction between banks which are wisely managed and those which are conducted unwisely or even recklessly. Removing, as it does, the necessity for conservative action in the interest of depositors, it inevitably tends to stimulate more speculative action in the interest of stockholders and to lower the banking standards of the country.

The proposed guaranty is clearly undesirable, in my judgment, in its effect on our financial structure. The Federal Treasury at this difficult time is subject to a payment of approximately $150,000,000, a sum equal to the total heretofore received from the Federal reserve system in lieu of a franchise tax. It contributes also indirectly a further sum of $150,000,000, payable out of reserve funds of the Federal reserve system and properly belonging to the Federal Government. It is also deprived of further sums payable under existing law out of earnings of the Federal reserve system and available as reserves or for debt retirement. The Federal reserve system is subject to the payment referred to of $150,000,000, the effect of which must be, in turn, to weaken the system in its essential task of protecting the integrity of credit and currency. Member banks are subject to a payment of $100,000,000, with similar annual assessments, in whole or in part, whenever the total guaranty fund falls below $500,000,000. The constant drain upon sound banks in the interest of unsound banks must tend to weaken the entire system. Adoption of the plan may well lead to withdrawal of member banks from the Federal reserve system with great injury to the system. It may also lead to the closing of State banks throughout the Nation incapable of complying with conditions prescribed for inclusion under the plan. The possible adverse effect of its adoption on the credit of the country as a whole is impossible to predict.

Aside from these considerations our entire experience in America indicates that the proposed guaranty would prove incapable of accomplishing the result which it purports to assure. Experiments over a period of many years with proposals of similar character indicate that under the proposed plan the number of bank failures would ultimately increase rather than decrease, with resulting liabilities in excess of available resources and complete breakdown of the plan. Eight States have tried the experiment of a guaranty plan in recent years. In every instance, I am informed, there has been an increase in the number of mismanaged banks and ultimate bankruptcy of the guaranty fund.

Under these conditions, why hold out false hopes to the people of the country?

The hearings before the House Committee on Banking and Currency embody no statement by the Secretary of the Treasury or members of the Federal Reserve Board. It is understood, however, that the Secretary, members of the board, and the Comptroller of the Currency are all opposed to the proposed guaranty. The statement of the Comptroller of the Currency, appearing on page 6 of the hearings, leaves no doubt of his position in the matter:

> In my opinion, the enactment of this bill would destroy the Federal reserve system by driving the strong banks from it. It would lead to closing of thousands of small State banks which can not qualify as members of the Federal reserve system. It would put a premium upon incompetency and irresponsibility by rendering it no longer necessary for the country banker to be concerned for the safety of his depositors.

Similar views have long been entertained by leaders in business and finance. Almost a quarter of a century ago the American Bankers' Association, at its annual convention in Denver, Colo., in 1908, adopted the following resolution:

> Resolved, That the American Bankers' Association is unalterably opposed to any arbitrary plan looking to the mutual guaranty of deposits, either by the State or Nation, for the following reasons:
> 1. It is a function outside of State or National Government.
> 2. It is unsound in principle.
> 3. It is impractical and misleading.
> 4. It is revolutionary in character.
> 5. It is subversive to sound economics.
> 6. It will lower the standard of our present banking system.
> 7. It is productive of and encourages bad banking.
> 8. It is a delusion that a tax upon the strong will prevent failures of the weak.
> 9. It discredits honesty, ability, and conservatism.
> 10. A loss suffered by one bank jeopardizes all banks.
> 11. The public must eventually pay the tax.
> 12. It will cause and not avert panics.
> Resolved, That the American Bankers' Association is unalterably opposed to any arbitrary plan looking to the mutual guaranty of deposits, either by the State or by the Nation, believing it to be impracticable, unsound, misleading, revolutionary in character, and subversive to sound economics, placing a tool in the hands of the unscrupulous and inexperienced for reckless banking, and knowing further that such a law would weaken our banking system and jeopardize the interest of the people.

In the light of opinion of this character, in the light of actual experience in this country, it seems to me impossible to support the proposed guaranty which is before us.

There are other important features in the bill which, in my judgment, constitute most serious objections to its enactment, such as the rearranged distribution of earnings of Federal reserve banks, which heretofore have been used to strengthen the system by building up surplus and as reserves by the Federal Treasury; and the requirement of immediate credit subject to interest or discount on checks and drafts presented to a Federal reserve bank for collection, with possible injury to the existing system of par collections. Time does not permit of discussion of these or other aspects of the bill which, in my judgment, are highly undesirable. It is sufficient to say that the bill, in my opinion, is almost wholly bad legislation, replete with suggestions inimical to the maintenance of sound conditions in our national finances upon which the confidence of the public is so largely dependent.

The principal problem to which this bill is directed is the problem of affording appropriate security to depositors in our banks. The importance of this problem is apparent to us all. The method of dealing with it, however, is also of the greatest importance. Temporary relief has already been provided through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the Glass-Steagall bill. The problem in the long run is to eliminate, not encourage, bank management which is untrustworthy and unsound. This is no time for experiment with fundamentals of national credit and currency. It is no time for gestures of hope which are essentially unsound and impractical. The House, in my judgment, has already at this session made one gesture of this character with harmful effect to the general situation. I hope sincerely that the amendment under consideration will prevail.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I am disposed to vote against the entire bill; but as I am not an expert on financial matters I may still be persuaded to vote for it. I intend to listen very carefully to the arguments in order that I may finally determine my vote by considering the greater wisdom of other Members.

I fear that the bill is a guaranty of Government policy itself. Some of us contend that the tariff destroys business, and the destruction of business destroys banks. Shall we insure depositors against the disastrous results of a bad tariff? Tax bills destroy business, and the destruction of business destroys banks. Shall we insure, out of Government funds, against the unwisdom of certain tax bills? Great foreign loans have been made by banks. Shall we put the Government into the position where it must pass upon the adequacy of the security of foreign loans, because certainly the money comes out of the banks and, perhaps, out of the pockets of the depositors who buy them from the banks, and that destroys the capacity of banks?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Yes.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the purpose of this bill is not to assist banks. It is supposed to be a depositors' bill. That is the purpose of it. It is not a bill to assist banks as business institutions.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. I thank the gentleman for the observation. I had in mind the identical thing. But in assisting depositors, of course, you are assisting banks. I have no objection to assisting banks, but the thing about it is we have to guarantee the wisdom of the Government, because the Government itself might by some disastrous policy close up half the banks in the Nation.

The bills we have voted upon this session, the arguments made on this floor, show the tremendous effect of governmental policy on private business. The extension of public credit to private business and the necessary governmental supervision over the expenditure of its funds make private business depend to a great degree on the wisdom of governmental officials. The great pieces of banking legislation passed by the House have been analyzed by some as ruining the banks and by others as bringing them salvation. The point I make is that since the Government is so potent for better or worse, this insurance policy must take the risk of the wisdom of the Government itself.

We have seen catastrophes sweeping over the entire world, and others predicted on this floor that half the banks in America were about to close as a result. During the Reconstruction Finance Corporation debate that statement was made. Perhaps they exaggerated their pessimism. I am glad to say that disastrous result did not take place. But are we going to guarantee partly out of the public purse the effect of world-wide disasters and give the public money to the depositors in the banks when they put their money in the banks on their own risk and on their own confidence in the integrity and wisdom of officials in banks in their own communities? Depositors, not taxpayers, should take the risk of world-wide disaster. Are we going to guarantee against acts of God and other kinds of catastrophes, like the great earthquake that swept over San Francisco? Will we insure against the ruin of wars? Are we going to insure against such catastrophes out of the taxpayers' money? I personally can not see that we have a reservoir big enough to do that very fine work, if it can be done.

A foreign war between two other nations may close up banks whose depositors are heavily interested in trade with those nations. These very depositors may have borrowed money from their own bank only to find that the war smashed their business. In turn, their inability to pay the bank smashed the bank. Shall we guarantee the deposits of depositors whose very unpaid credits closed the bank? A war between our country and another may close up a lot of banks. Is the taxpayer who is asked to lose his life on the battlefield still to be called upon to pay the depositors in these banks in full?

I am afraid we are insuring at this moment a bad risk. Nobody thinks the banks are sound and healthy and strong. No life-insurance company could be organized to insure the patients in a tuberculosis hospital. Therefore, why should the taxpayer, when he is groaning now and shouting and complaining against taxes, be asked to put his money in to back up a bad risk? Why not wait until the risk gets better, and then put his money in if you think it can work out to the benefit of the depositors?

I object to calling it, as it is called in the public press, a Government guaranty of bank deposits. I think there is some fraud in that title. The Government is not guaranteeing with its whole power but merely by limited contribution and is making the banks and their depositors guarantee their own deposits.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. We have banks using Government titles, such as county banks, State banks, United States banks. I think this is a fraud on the depositors. I do not believe we ought to pass a bill like this giving the impression that the Government is guaranteeing bank deposits, because if the Government is going to guarantee deposits, then the taxpayer has got to back up this guaranty fully and the money will have to be paid out of the Public Treasury no matter what the loss.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. If we launch on a policy of guaranteeing deposits piecemeal, is it not reasonable to assume that the Government should guarantee them to the fullest extent?

Mr. OLIVER of New York. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is no escape from such logic.

Mr. OLIVER of New York. If we are going to guarantee them with the conception of honor and integrity that we have for this country, we can not go halfway with it. If a great disaster should come that sweeps down half of the banks, then the Government of the United States will have to turn to the taxpayers and say, "Give every one of these depositors the money they put into these banks." There is no question about this in my mind.

I am also apprehensive that the scope of the bill giving a Government authority here the power to remove local bank officials is going to lead to a contraction of credit. Of course, the insurer would have the right to supervise the institution that is insured.

We have enough things to make the banker fearful now. We have the failures of banks, we have the stockholders assessed double if the bank closes, and we have criminal prosecutions against the officers of banks. They are frightened to death, and they are the owners of the institutions. They will not lend money, and if some official in Washington here is going to have the power to reach into the community and say, "Because you lent this particular money on your own judgment, or did this or that thing, we, from Washington, will remove you," this will certainly add to the fear and the apprehension of the local banker and, perhaps, restrict our credit to the point where restriction will not only break the bank but break the business enterprises that are dependent upon the bank.

These are more or less instinctive views of one who is not a financier. As a Member of this House and as a lawyer, I am trying to be sincere in my study of the question, and I hope as the debate goes on, those more able and more learned may talk me out of my present views, because I want to vote for progress and security if mere insurance laws can achieve those happy results. [Applause.]

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. OLIVER] started out by saying he had not made up his mind on this bill and then proceeded for 10 minutes to oppose the bill. If the gentleman had not made up his mind when he started, I presume he made up his argument as he went along. Other men have got up here and said that they do not know anything about it, but they are against it.

I am against this amendment, because it seeks to kill the bill, and I am for this bill. I am for it because there never was such a need in America for a guaranty of deposits as there is right now.

The people are in a state of fear and they are fearful about putting their money in the banks. The President has been forming organizations to coax people to leave their money in the banks. There has been a great campaign to overcome this condition of fear. Why are the people afraid? They are afraid to put their money in the banks because they fear it will not be there when they want it; and if the depositors are afraid, so are the banks. They are afraid to lend money for fear the depositors will come for it. For this reason we have few banks in the country that are doing business to-day as banks.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I have a very high regard for the gentleman's opinion——

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I have a great deal of affection for the gentleman.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. I would like to ask if the gentleman is in favor of Government guaranty of deposits?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. No. I am in favor of the banks guaranteeing the money that the people put in the banks. [Applause.] That is the purpose of this bill. Do you not think the Government should contribute in starting the fund? The Government sets up a charter that invites everybody to come and put their money in the banks. Has the Government no responsibility to protect the interests of the people whose money it has invited into these banks? Of course it has. [Applause.] I think it should contribute to setting up such a fund.

Now, what is the argument against this proposition? One Member says it will make weak banks. It will make strong banks, if the deposits are guaranteed. It will not make weak banks. The trouble with the banks now is that they are weak and that is the reason everybody is afraid, including the banks themselves. If you will guarantee the deposits in the banks they will be strong banks.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. BOILEAU. Why is there a provision in the bill to the effect that banks with a capital and surplus of less than $25,000 are not eligible?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. That is going to be taken out of the bill. I am assured by the chaiman [Mr. STEAGALL] that he is going to accept an amendment to let the State banks all come in, and we ought to do this. They have had less losses than the other banks. Do not get the idea in your head that the little bank is not sound. It is the big bank that you have to be afraid of. The little bank is not going to do much damage to the guaranty fund if it does fail, but in the little community where the people take their earnings and their savings and put them into the little bank as protection against sickness or old age, in order to manage their business or to manage their farms, should they not have protection?

Mr. PITTENGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. PITTENGER. The gentleman was talking about the little banks a moment ago; how would they get in under this provision?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I stated that the chairman is going to accept an amendment that will let all of them come in.

Mr. PITTENGER. Do they not have to submit to an examination?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. They are to be examined by their own State bank authorities, just as they are now.

Mr. PITTENGER. How do we have any assurance that they can qualify?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. How do we have any such assurance now? We do not have any.

Mr. PITTENGER. That is true.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. We will have the same assurance we have now. They come in as they are, with the certificate of their State bank commissioner.

Mr. PITTENGER. What I am wondering about is whether the little banks will get in, even under the proposed amendment.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. They will get in if they want to and if they are sound. If they are not sound, you should stop letting people deposit money in them.

Mr. PITTENGER. Would not the effect of this legislation be to centralize everything in the Federal reserve banks?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Absolutely no.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I would like to make an inquiry of the chairman of the committee—if he intends soon to make a motion to limit debate?

Mr. STEAGALL. I will say in view of the importance of this amendment I thought we would not be very exacting as to the extension of time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Debate has been running now over an hour on this amendment, and if we are going to finish the bill to-day it will be midnight.

Mr. STEAGALL. We will soon close the debate on this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas? The Chair hears none.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. They talk about this making bad banking. How will it make bad banking any more than we have now? How will it make it any worse to have the deposits in banks guaranteed? Talk about bad management, how will it make the management any worse if we guarantee the deposits?

You all admit that State, public, and school funds require bonds from the banker, that they must be guaranteed. Why should these funds be guaranteed and protected, when the deposits of the little depositor are not guaranteed? We should protect the weak as well as the strong.

I do not know whether you gentlemen ever lived in a town where there was a bank failure. I have, and I have known of a widow, who placed the savings of her husband and herself, amounting to a few hundred dollars, in the bank and have the bank close. I have seen that happen. I would like to prevent it.

Do not you think that when men organize a bank, get a State or National charter and advertise to have people to put money in the bank, there should be some protection extended to such depositors?

Now, the reason that State laws for guaranteeing deposits in banks failed, as has been so often referred to, was because of the fact that the fund was not big enough to carry the load. In Kansas, Nebraska, and Oklahoma their fund was not big enough to start with, and there was not enough of capital to, by assessments, make the fund strong.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. Why was not the fund large enough?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. Because there was not money enough in it. Our States had not the funds to create a proper fund.

Mr. PARSONS. Might that not be the trouble in this fund?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. No. We start with $500,000,000, and have the power of assessment on all the banks of this great Nation of ours, including the big banks, with large capital. There is no danger that the fund so established will fail.

Here is the trouble: The big banks say, "We are big enough to guarantee our depositors; our position is secure; and why should we contribute to a guaranty fund for the little banks?"

Well, because they are a part of the financial structure of this country, acting by authority of a charter from the people of the country and should join in making the funds of the people who deposit their savings and capital in the banks safe, it would be worth to-day all the big banks would pay in 20 years to prevent what has happened this year. It would be worth all they will pay in 10 years to now restore the confidence of the people in the banks.

I hope my friends will vote for this bill. Do not be misled by the propaganda that is sent out by the big banks, or by the propaganda sent out by the bank commissioners. Of course, bank commissioners are apt to follow the judgment of those who are credited with experience through long years in the management of large banks. They do not have an opportunity to study the hearings that caused the committee to favorably report this bill, and often have not studied the bill; they do not know what amendments are to be made; they wire you to oppose it, but what you have to answer is whether or not the people who put money in the banks shall be safe in doing so, and if you will consult the people and the depositors and not the big banks, you will vote for this bill. I think it is safe; I think the fund is big enough to take care of losses with the right of assessment on all the banks of this Nation. I think we ought to pass this bill at the present time in the interest of making the people of the United States feel that this country is safe, that our banks are a safe place in which to keep their money.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, we have arrived at the consideration of the most important provision in this bill. The arguments against this bill are so timeworn and so well known to the members of the committee who have studied the legislation that we were familiar with them before the bill was ever brought on the floor of the House. It would be interesting if you could go to my office and read the propaganda that has been sent there, much of which has been put in the RECORD in speeches of Members. I want to say that during the years that I have served in this House I have never seen such support accorded any bill that has been offered in this House. This support has come from all classes. It is not stereotyped. It is spontaneous. It comes from every class of business—from bankers, lawyers, farmers, merchants, and economists. Some of it was written by hands worn with toil, in handwriting scarcely legible—all pleading for legislation to establish some plan to afford safe banks in which citizens may deposit the proceeds of their toil. Only this morning a letter came from a banker in Saginaw, Mich., a bank with $18,000,000 deposits. One came from a leading banker in Kentucky. One from Tennessee. One from a great judge in North Carolina and a former distinguished Member of Congress. They write in demanding this legislation as an essential and indispensable step to the restoration of confidence and the revival of business in the United States. This is where support comes for this bill. These are the influences that prompted it. It was born of the distress of our people. Let me tell you where the opposition comes from. It comes from selfish men who attempt to treat banking as a private business in which the public has no interest—a mere matter of money making. These shortsighted men forget that the public supplies the money out of which their profits are made. I am sure that I need not disclaim any criticism of any Member of the House in what I am about to say. Lobbyists come to see me often. Some of them are delightful gentlemen and I always show them every courtesy they could expect.

I want to read something to you from the Southern Banker:

A delegation of big bankers came to Washington to see the Members of Congress from a certain State.

In that delegation there was a representative of a big bank that has a string of branch banks in that State reaching out and taking over control of the credits of the people. There was another representative of one of the big branches of the same bank and another individual banker. I read from the Southern Banker of April, 1932, referring to this bill. They went back, and here is what they reported:

It is the opinion of the delegation that outside pressure on a major scale is forcing the issue on Congress for early consideration. This is corroborated by a surprising number of pending bills on the subject. Many of them have been introduced by responsible Members in both Houses.

* * * * * * *

We pointed out to them that a Federal law would, in the public mind, have an immediate adverse effect on all banks not national or members of the Federal reserve system and therefore not covered by the law.

That objection to the bill has been removed.

The ——— delegation gave our committee a very lengthy and friendly hearing. We feel that this exchange of ideas and personal contact has proven mutually helpful. With this in mind we are bringing the situation to your attention and offer the suggestion that if other State associations would immediately send similar committees to Washington to confer with their own State delegations excellent results can be anticipated.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. STEAGALL (continuing reading)—

A circular on the same subject is going to all State associations from the American Bankers' Association. The suggestion which we are making meets with the hearty approval of their staff in New York. It is also approved by our deputy manager in Washington, D. C. It will be well for any bankers in Washington to get in communication with our representative before seeing their State delegation, as he will be able to fully advise them regarding any developments since our committee was in Washington. It is not thought desirable at this time to attempt to cover the subject in telegrams to Members of Congress opposing this measure.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEAGALL. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I have yielded away much of the time during this debate that I could have used to better advantage. My time is limited, and I hope the gentleman will excuse me. The three bankers came before the subcommittee and offered their views. They said they were against the bill because it provides for funds to come out of the Treasury. We asked what they thought of the Reconstruction Corporation bill that takes $2,000,000,000 out of the Treasury, and they thought that was a wonderful legislative accomplishment.

I have not referred to the State nor the names of the gentlemen who came here on that committee. I have no unkind things to say about them, but I do say that big branch bankers, who are strangling the life out of the independent banks and destroying community life by this vicious and un-American system of branch banking, are not safe leaders for the representatives of the American people in the Congress of the United States.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] said that we were making a raid on the Treasury. You may strike from this bill the provision that takes $150,000,000 out of the Treasury, and we will have available resources for the protection fund that will approximate $1,000,000,000. That sum would more than cover the net losses of all depositors in the banks of this Nation since the establishment of the Government. This fund, without the $150,000,000 from the Federal Treasury, which rightly belongs to the banks out of whose deposits and capital the earnings were made, would approximate $1,000,000,000, to be available within one year. This fund is dignified. It is ample and sufficient. Big banks are causing more difficulty than small banks. Let me say to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. STRONG] that it is the little banks who should object to being thrown into partnership with the big banks.

One bank failure in New York, a member of the Federal reserve system, involved more of the deposits than the deposits in all the small banks in two or three States. Nonmember banks outnumber the Federal reserve banks by more than two to one and have deposits equal to one and one-half times the deposits in Federal reserve banks, but at the same time State banks have less deposits tied up in failed banks than in the case of Federal reserve banks. There are more deposits in the member banks that have failed in the State of New York than in nonmember banks. There are more deposits tied up in the member banks in the State of Pennsylvania that failed than in State banks in that State. Bank deposits constitute a loan. Every man who knows the alphabet of banking understands that small loans are desirable. They are always the safest loans. So it is with deposits. Small banks make for safety and for solvency. They are for depositors the same thing small borrowers are for banks. Concentrated risks are always most dangerous.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] spoke about a raid on the Treasury. Let me say that it does not lie in the mouth of any man who voted to open the doors of the Treasury of the United States and set up a $2,000,000,000 guaranty fund out of the money of the taxpayers of America in order to save our big banks, upon whose insistence that legislation was passed, to criticize this bill as a raid on the Treasury. That legislation was our first national guaranty deposit plan. To support that plan we took $2,000,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States. I say it does not lie in the mouth of the man who voted for that bill to oppose this measure, which applies the universally accepted principle of insurance to the banking business of the United States in the effort to place our banking system upon a basis that will command the confidence of our people and the respect of the world! [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment do now close.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PATMAN) there were ayes 90 and noes 15.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN].

There was no objection.

The Clerk again reported the McFadden amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MCFADDEN) there were ayes 60 and noes 76.

Mr. MCFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered, and Mr. STEAGALL and Mr. MCFADDEN were appointed as tellers.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 96, noes 129.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment which the clerk will report.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. PATMAN. The motion to shut off debate did not include the section but only the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion was to shut off debate on the one amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PATMAN: Page 7, line 18, after the word "surplus," insert "If the Federal reserve banks are charged as much as one-half of 1 per cent interest with the amount of notes issued to it in compliance with section 16 of the Federal reserve act then and in that event."

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order the amendment is not germane to the bill or to the section, if I caught the full reading of it. It undertakes to write into the bill a provision to change the relationship between the Government and the Federal reserve banks on the question of the issuance of money. It is not germane to the bill.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

Under present law all excess reserves of the Federal reserve banks, or all earnings of the Federal reserve banks after expenses and dividends have been paid and a certain surplus set aside, are placed in the Treasury of the United States and become public property or public money. In other words, all the excess reserves go to the Government.

Section 5 provides that the excess reserves hereafter shall not go to the Government, but one-half of them shall go to the reserve fund set up for the guaranty of deposits and the other half shall go back to the member banks.

My amendment provides that shall not be true except in the event the banks pay one-half of 1 per cent interest on these notes when they are issued. In other words, this provision in the bill seeks to deprive the Government of any revenue at all by reason of its franchise granted to the Federal reserve banks. I say if you are going to deprive the Government of the excess reserves it has been getting, let us in compliance with the present law require that a certain amount of interest shall be charged when these notes are issued. Certainly it is material in section 5, because section 5 attempts to divert funds that are now going to the Public Treasury of the United States, and I merely want to insert a provision that if those funds are diverted the Government shall get that revenue by charging at least one-half of 1 per cent on the initial issuance of the Federal reserve notes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I go even farther than the gentleman from Texas. The gentleman from Texas bases his argument upon the proposition that his amendment is based upon existing law. I submit to the Chair that the text provides that one-half of the remainder of the net earnings shall be paid into the Federal guaranty fund for depositors, and so forth, and that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas merely interposes a condition or situation under which such one-half the remainder of the net earnings shall be paid into the Federal guaranty fund. In other words, it simply imposes, modifies, or limits the effect of the language which is already in the text, and certainly there can not be any doubt on the ground of germaneness. Whether the amendment is intelligent or intelligible, whether it is wise, whether it changes existing law, or whether it may be out of harmony with the theory of the sponsors of the bill are, of course, not pertinent matters of inquiry for the Chair in determining the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless the gentleman desires to be heard further on the point of order the Chair is ready to rule.

The Chair thinks the amendment of the gentleman from Texas clearly relates to the subject matter of the section to which it is offered and that it is germane.

The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I want to emphasize the fact that this is a bill to appropriate $647,126,882 out of the Treasury of the United States.

I want all of you Members who have been talking about balancing the Budget to remember that $147,126,882 is to be taken out of the Treasury. That amount has been paid into the Treasury and spent. Then $500,000,000 more, which this board may borrow from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Of course, that money will come from the Treasury of the United States, just as the money that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is spending to-day is coming from the Treasury of the United States. So let us not be deceived. This is a bill to appropriate $647,126,882 from the Treasury of the United States.

Furthermore, let us not deceive ourselves. There is a valuable franchise that is wrapped up in this bill. Very little has been said about that franchise. I wish I had time to tell you all I know about it. I have been working on this proposal for months, and I feel I know something about it which the membership would like to know. There is a franchise in this bill. I will not say it is concealed or hidden, but there is a franchise of great value. If you were to value it as franchises of corporations are valued, I venture to say it would be worth $25,000,000,000. So let us consider that valuable franchise and that $647,000,000 which you are attempting to appropriate from the Treasury of the United States.

I will say to the members of the committee that this is a very important amendment. I believe a majority of the members of this committee will agree it should be adopted when they understand it, if they do not understand it now.

In the original Federal reserve act there is a provision that when these Federal reserve notes are issued by the Government to the Federal reserve bank a certain rate of interest shall be paid. Remember, a Federal reserve note is an obligation of this Nation. All the homes and all the wealth of this Nation are behind those notes. The law provides that the Federal reserve bank shall pay to the Government for that paper money the rate of interest that may be set by the Federal Reserve Board. It was intended that an interest charge should be assessed; but the Federal Reserve Board met in 1916 and said, "In view of the fact that we get all the excess earnings of these banks, why assess an interest charge when the notes are issued? Let us go ahead and issue them, let them make a profit, and we get the excess." That is the reason Mr. W. P. G. Harding gave for not assessing an interest charge when the notes were issued.

If you are going to attempt to deprive the Government of the United States of the excess profits which they expected to make, let us go back to the original act and require the Federal Reserve Board to get at least one-half of 1 per cent interest on those notes. Is not that reasonable?

You can take all the Democratic platforms as far back as Democratic platforms were printed, and you will not find anything that will authorize this side of the House, the Democratic side, to vote to give the credit of this Nation to private bankers.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. That is what you are doing. You are voting to give the credit of this Nation to private bankers without receiving one penny of compensation for that franchise. Do you want to do that? If you do, vote against this amendment. Unless this amendment is adopted you are giving away the credit of the Nation.

You take the Federal reserve bank. Not one dime of that stock is owned by the Government. The Government could own some of that stock but it has never exercised the privilege. It is all owned by private bankers. If you let this bill go, if it is enacted into law and if this amendment is not adopted you are just mortgaging the homes and the wealth of this Nation to secure paper money that is issued by private bankers for their own use and benefit, and not even requiring just one-half of 1 per cent interest. I do not believe you want to do it.

The distinguished gentleman from South Carolina a while ago was talking about how these notes were issued. You take a Federal reserve note. Back of that note is 40 per cent gold and the credit of the Nation. Who furnishes the gold? The Federal reserve system does not furnish it. Who furnishes the credit? The Federal reserve system does not furnish it. The depositors in national banks furnish the gold and the Government of the United States furnishes the credit. Do you mean to say that one holding and exercising that valuable right and privilege or franchise should not at least be compelled to pay just one-half of 1 per cent for using the mortgage on the people's homes to secure that paper money?

Let me tell you about these Federal reserve notes. You take an automobile acceptance corporation, organized under State laws. It can sell its automobiles to the distributor and take an acceptance due in 90 days. It takes that acceptance to the Federal reserve bank and gets currency issued on it. And what do they do? They charge a man who buys an automobile sometimes as much as 25 per cent interest, and yet they get money on the automobile paper for 1½ and 2½ per cent interest, using the credit of this Nation free of charge in order to do it.

Now, my friends, if you want to condone and put your stamp of approval upon mortgaging all the wealth of this Nation in order to help and assist a few private bankers and not receive just one-half of 1 per cent interest, you vote against this amendment, but I beg you to consider it and let us charge at least one-half of 1 per cent interest for that great privilege and that great benefit, namely, the use of the credit and the wealth of our country in order to back up this paper money.

I realize the ones for this bill will not vote for the amendment. It is doubtful that my colleagues who are opposing the bill will vote with me on the amendment, for the reason that if amended as I propose, the bill will be less obnoxious and there will be less likelihood of the bill's defeat on final passage.

Under leave to extend my remarks the following is inserted:

I wonder why no roll call was desired on the passage of this bill. Every effort was made to prevent a record vote and those of us who were actively opposing the bill could not get sufficient support to cause a roll call. The representatives of the administration, although claiming they were opposed to the legislation, did very little, if anything, to defeat it and helped prevent a record vote. On a record vote the bill would have been defeated. I know a majority of the Members of Congress would refuse to vote for such legislation. It was called a bill to protect depositors. It had a good name. It was really a bill to appropriate $647,000,000 out of the Treasury and to give a perpetual franchise to private bankers to enjoy a monopoly on the issuance of paper money backed by the credit of the Nation. Another coalition measure.

The bill will never become a law. It passed the House because it was backed by the coalition of Democrats and Republicans. The Republican Members can not disclaim responsibility for its passage in the House when they refused to force a roll call.

The contraction of credit and currency has caused the condition of the banks in the Nation. The following table discloses the shrinkage in stocks and bonds:

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat puzzled at the attitude of the gentleman who has expressed care for the Treasury of the United States so solicitously in view of certain agitation that has been rather prominently forwarded by the gentleman and with which I have not expressed any dissent. But I am also puzzled at the gentleman's attitude when he says that here is a $25,000,000,000 franchise that is being given away to the big bankers, and yet we have the big bankers all wiring us to vote against it. Have the big bankers gone daffy that they do not know a good thing when they see it?

Mr. Chairman, my friend has been dreaming. He has gone absolutely wild on this subject. The gentleman asks who furnishes the gold to put behind the money. Why, the Federal reserve banks furnish it, and they furnish it out of money that is paid in by the stockholders, the member banks, and out of the money that is deposited with them as the 7 per cent reserve that they have to maintain, coming directly from the depositors. [Applause.] This is where the gold comes from, and to-day, with $2,000,000,000 of notes outstanding, they are required to maintain at least $800,000,000 of reserve in gold against that, on which they can not get a cent of interest. The Federal reserve banks are bearing this burden, and they are recompensed by charging a discount to the member banks.

My friend the gentleman from Texas wants to put a tax on the issuance of Federal reserve notes to the Federal reserve banks, because we come here and say that we want some of that fund that is made by the money that the Federal reserve banks have made off of the depositors of this country, to secure the citizen in his home, to secure citizens all over the country who have mortgages on their homes, and who put some money in the bank and wake up the next day to find it is impossible to get it, and then they see their Government going off with all of the first-class securities in that bank while they are left with a little pittance of a dividend on their deposits.

I move, Mr. Chairman, that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PATMAN) there were—ayes 10, noes 125.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. The first paragraph of section 13, as amended, of the Federal reserve act (U. S. C., title 12, sec. 342) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"Upon application of a sending bank, a Federal reserve bank shall give immediate credit on checks and drafts received from such bank for collection, but the Federal reserve bank may charge on such credit an amount of interest calculated at the current rediscount rate from the time of receipt of such item to the time of collection thereof, or, with the approval of the Federal Reserve Board, may establish a time schedule for the calculation of such period."

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the action which has just been taken on my proposal to strike out section 5 of this bill indicates a lack of knowledge on the part of the House of just what has taken place.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion of the particular facts about the Federal reserve note issue which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN] has been making during consideration of the bill yesterday and to-day.

I may say to the membership of the House that what the gentleman from Texas has been saying about interference with Federal reserve note issues is correct. By the adoption of that section you have given a deadly blow to the Federal reserve act. You are taking action which is fundamental, and this is one of the worst blows that has been administered to the Federal reserve system.

The matter of the granting of a franchise to private banks to issue Federal reserve notes is one of the most important functions this Government could have anything to do with. It gives these private banks the right to issue Federal reserve notes without limit so long as they have gold or Government bonds to put back of them. It was very safely guarded by the framers of the Federal reserve act so that they could not issue an excess amount of Federal reserve notes at any time. So this matter of the franchise tax, which you have destroyed here to-day, was the safeguard that was then provided.

It is perfectly true that the management of the Federal reserve back in 1916 did interfere somewhat with the workings of this particular provision, so that the earnings that have been put into the Treasury in the past have been given in bulk without reference to the safeguard that was placed upon the issuance of Federal reserve notes.

I simply want to make this clear to the House with respect to what they have just done in regard to removing one of the most important safeguards on the Federal reserve system.

I wish to refer again to another phase of this particular bill. It does appropriate $147,000,000 from the Public Treasury. It does take $150,000,000 from the Federal Reserve surplus. It does weaken the Federal reserve system to the extent of that $150,000,000.

You were told yesterday by the chairman of this committee that there is a bill pending in the Senate that is going to deplete still further the surplus of the Federal reserve system. Do you want to destroy the Federal reserve system? That is what you are doing. You are destroying the solidarity of the system. You are destroying the confidence of the countries of the world in the Federal reserve system by taking away from it its surplus funds. You are doing that which has been threatened for years—that some time during the crisis you would pass legislation which would take the surplus away from the Federal reserve system.

Now, if you want to destroy in this hour of great need the confidence in your financial system, then ignore all the safeguards in the Federal system.

What are you doing in addition to that? You are putting in here, directly or indirectly, $300,000,000 out of the Treasury of the United States; you are authorizing, as the gentleman has said, the building up of this new board that is created and authorizing them to take from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the back door of the United States Treasury, at least $500,000,000 more, reducing the funds that much that are now available to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which funds come from the United States Treasury.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. McFADDEN. If the gentleman does not want me to continue, I am perfectly willing.

Mr. STEAGALL. I am not going to object to the extension for the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but I shall hereafter object to any further extension.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McFADDEN. Not only the national banks but the State banks are to have access to this new organization and a guaranty of their deposits.

It was stated this morning, and I notice that the assurance brought many votes in favor of the bill, because the statement was made that all State banks are to be permitted to come in under the system and have their deposits guaranteed.

Now, gentlemen, what are you doing here? You are guaranteeing all of the deposits, fifty or sixty billion dollars, in the United States through this system. You are providing $300,000,000 of the fund of $500,000,000, which is to come, directly or indirectly, out of the Federal Treasury, and if additional funds are necessary they are to come indirectly from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to the extent of $500,000,000 more through authorization to borrow.

Is there anyone in this House who will claim that the United States Government is not obligated to take care of all of the deposits of the banks in the United States? We have seen the creation of these bodies that were not going to take any money out of the Treasury come back and ask for it in an emergency. There will be an emergency, and they will come back here asking the Government to pay deposits in all banks. The public may well understand that the United States Government, if this bill passes, will eventually guarantee all deposits in every bank in the United States.

The gentleman from North Carolina, when he refused to yield to me, was speaking in reference to the gold-settlement fund. I wanted to point out the error he was making, that the gold-settlement fund is a deposit made to facilitate the transactions in connection with the transit department known as the settlement of checks, drafts, and so forth in the Federal system, and has nothing at all to do with the note issues.

Now, if you are going to guarantee all bank deposits, you are going to guarantee $2,000,000,000 of deposits of the National City Bank of New York. You are going to guarantee the deposits of the Chase National Bank of New York another $2,000,000,000; you are going to guarantee the deposits of the Guaranty Trust Co. of New York, and of the First National Bank of Chicago, and the Continental Illinois Trust Co. of Chicago, running into hundreds of millions of dollars and other big banks like these. Do you know to-day the kind of business these banks are doing? Do you know how they are hooked up in international affairs? Gentlemen, you are taking a leap in the dark here in passing this bill. You are going to destroy what further confidence there is in the United States in our banking system. You are delivering one of the greatest blows at confidence internationally just as it did after the passage of the Goldsborough bill, in the loss of confidence by the other nations.

Our gold is leaving us by the hundreds of millions of dollars. Every day shows $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 of exports, because the people in other countries who have money on deposit here are losing confidence. They are not only drawing their money but selling their securities and withdrawing that money because you are passing this kind of legislation, unsound legislation, which deals with the very fundamentals of our finances. This will not accomplish what you are claiming it will accomplish. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I do not presume to speak for the President, but I do think it is clear and evident that he has something in mind with reference to bank deposits; otherwise, he would not have alluded to the subject so frequently in his public utterances.

The plan must be of a character that will give confidence to the depositors. How else can this confidence and security be provided except by some plan of insurance of the deposits in every bank authorized to receive the people's money? The opponents of the measure now pending claim it places a premium on reckless banking and would require the stronger banks to carry the weaker ones. Does anyone claim to be in a position to-day to differentiate as to who are the reckless bankers and which bank is weak and which one is strong? A system or policy of banking that permits the banking institutions to engage directly or indirectly in the selling of securities on a commission, or underwriting basis, is neither sound, safe, or ethical.

A system of insurance for bank deposits is neither socialistic, populistic, or Bryanesque. It is possible to establish a plan on an absolutely scientific basis. The aggregate of losses for a period of years is easily ascertainable. In the next few months we should know the probable losses that will be brought about by the present depression. With these figures at hand it is possible to determine with accuracy the amount that would be required to be deposited annually by the banking institutions to create a fund amply sufficient to take care of any losses, thus spreading the cost through a period of years and borne pro rata throughout the country.

The banking business is a major and most vital industry within itself, whether the bank be operating under a Federal or a State charter. All are receiving deposits from the public, and there is no sound argument against the banks as an institution bearing the full responsibility as a whole for the privileges granted.

It is unfortunate that the pending measure has been referred to as a bank-deposit guaranty measure, when the purpose is to provide a sound form of insurance for bank deposits. What is the difference in guaranty and insurance? A guaranty presupposes, as it was understood in the several States that adopted it, and have since repealed or discontinued the practice, that a form of assessment upon the banking group within the State would provide a fund immediately available to pay depositors of any failed bank. This scheme is in a measure parallel to the fraternal or assessment plan of life insurance, as compared with the old-line life-insurance companies' plan based upon a premium that provides a reserve, or sinking fund, as against no reserve fund in the former plan.

To illustrate, if the banks of the entire country had set apart as an insurance fund to meet losses from insolvent institutions one-half of 1 per cent, 50 cents per hundred, $5 per thousand, $5,000 per million dollars of their average annual deposits, invested at 3 per cent compound interest, the fund to-day, based on the assumption that the aggregate deposits throughout the country have averaged $30,000,000,000 a year for the past 20 years, would amount to $4,151,400,000. This amount would, no doubt, be reduced in taking care of the losses from insolvent banks. But will anyone here claim that this sum would not have met all the losses incurred in the past 20 years and be ample to meet present emergencies, even with the slip-shod methods now employed in banking and which have existed throughout this period?

Proper supervision and restrictions with reference to the character of securities eligible for banks to invest in, will go a long way toward preventing a recurrence of present conditions. The people of the country are demanding that bank deposits be made safe and secure. The bankers themselves should want some such system. Some of the keenest minds of our country are engaged in the banking business. They will have no difficulty in formulating rules and regulations and in providing adequate methods of examination to meet the situation created under an act providing for the insurance of bank deposits. The funds provided in the pending bill to create the reserve were contributed indirectly by the depositors at large throughout the country; and in using such funds as proposed, the benefits would accrue and any disbursements would go substantially to the original contributors, or to the taxpayers so frequently mentioned.

Should the Federal Government wish to retain money collected indirectly from citizens brought to want and desperation by an unscientific banking system?

Our solicitude should be for the depositors.

Mr. HOGG of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, one of the inherent evils of our industrial life has been the insecurity which the public has felt in placing their deposits in banks. Speculation of bank funds destroys confidence.

In 1930, 1,345 banks failed, owing depositors $865,000,000. That is, 1 bank out of 18 failed, but the actual loss of national banks, as registered by the Comptroller of the Currency, shows that only $82,000,000 have been lost to the depositors of all banks liquidated up to this time.

During the past 66 years the national banks have handled more than $400,000,000,000 of deposits.

INSURANCE IS AN INSTITUTION

Human life is insured on the basis of risk based upon the report of actuaries. Life-insurance companies have become of great benefit to the American people. Insurance in numerous and varied forms has become an institution in our country. There is every reason why it should apply to bank deposits. When the United States Government makes a deposit in any member bank or State bank it requires United States bonds to be deposited as a guaranty of its own deposits. The public is encouraged to rely upon the banks without any guaranty.

The ascertained estimated loss is less than one-sixtieth part of 1 per cent of annual average deposits.

Guaranteeing or insuring bank deposits means protecting the stability of business and industry and a sense of security that is not experienced at this time.

When bank deposits are guaranteed, it will bring into the banks a larger part of the currency which has been carried in the pockets of the people to the sum of about $4,000,000,000. There is only fifty-five hundred million of currency in circulation, of which the banks have less than $1,000,000,000 and the people have four and a half billion less than the amount abroad.

In the United States there are 48 State banking systems and a national banking system, with banks in every State, in competition with State banks.

FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM

The Federal reserve system, which is governed by the Federal Reserve Board, consists of 12 federated reserve banks allocated to a different area of our country. The object of using the Federal reserve system was to mobilize gold resources into 12 pools.

A Federal reserve bank does business only with members of the Federal reserve system which own the bank. The additional purpose was to create a necessary kind of paper money, which would not be based upon bonds but upon commercial and industrial transactions. That includes the manufacturing and transportation of goods, and any unfinished process of wealth. Thus the currency would naturally contract and expand as conditions of business necessitated.

The Federal reserve issued this money to member banks on their notes, and member banks return it when it is canceled. It is now our principal paper money. In spite of these useful purposes, the Federal reserve system has failed to make safe the deposits. It has not increased the security of the depositor in the least. It is regrettable that it has failed to limit the growth of speculation on the part of banks, especially when we know that speculation has brought the country to the condition in which it now is. It is a common occurrence for national banks to do indirectly, by means of subsidiary corporations, the things which they can not do directly. There is no limit to the number of such affiliates.

DANGER IN AFFILIATES

It is common for these subsidiary corporations to engage in all kinds of transactions wholly improper for the bank. For instance, they became experts in stock jobbing and pool gambling on the stock exchange. Naturally, the bank lends them money for such wrongful purposes. An affiliate is frequently used to take bad losses from the bank and to use the money borrowed from the bank for that purpose.

The Federal reserve system has not forbidden such practices and has permitted the bank funds to be loaned for speculation and gambling. Competent banking authorities say, and statistics are indisputable to the facts, that speculation has ruined more banks than all other causes together. Too often affiliates find small banks which are gullible and small banks which are led to believe that in dealing with affiliates they are dealing with the national bank. If the affiliates make money, it is the profit of the bank.

Naturally speculation follows any bank stock. A certain bank stock in New York fell from 500 to 100 within a week. Like all human institutions, the Federal reserve is not excluded from shortcomings.

EXPELLING AMERICAN GOLD IN 1927

In 1927 the Federal Reserve Bank of New York became convinced that America had too much gold for the good of the world, and sold the idea to the Federal Reserve Board at Washington. To expel American gold to foreign countries, and to make it so for foreign countries to sell their bonds to Wall Street, interest rates were made lower in New York than any place in the world. One member of the board later testified:

> This resulted in the most costly error committed by any banking system in the last 75 years. The result was to force on the banking world more credit and money than was needed, and to expel a few billion in gold to foreign countries. Then came the overflow in foreign bonds in Wall Street.

When the mistake was realized, no one could stop speculation; and when the crash came it involved everyone everywhere.

MISLEADING NAMES

A State bank in New York carried the name, "the Bank of the United States," and on its windows and stationery were the reassuring words, "member of the Federal reserve system."

Naturally, this misled the public. It had 400,000 depositors. Later, the chairman of the Federal reserve in New York testified that "the chairman of the Bank of the United States did not have our full confidence for a period of years." Yet nothing was done about it until the crash came. The head of the second largest bank in Wall Street, who is a director of the Federal reserve, said concerning the Bank of the United States, "There was the custom of forming an affiliate to take over bad loans. There were more than 50 of these affiliates which took over faulty assets and immediately borrowed money of the bank—a very dangerous practice."

It was generally known that depositors' money was used to inflate market value of its own influence. Yet it continued to be a member of the Federal reserve system.

ERRORS OF STATE EFFORTS

The State law to insure bank deposits failed because of bad banking, lax enforcement, and weak regulation. The guaranty funds finally proved insufficient to pay losses in the period of a panic. Their experience points a way to a sound national-insurance system. Such a guaranty fund sufficiently financed and properly administered will afford the security that depositors are justly entitled to. It is a responsibility which is due the depositors. Banking is a quasi-public business. A bank should be a safe place for the people's money. It should also provide a financial reservoir where money and credit can be obtained upon reasonable terms. Overbanking breeds bad banking, speculation, and bankruptcy. This bill does not provide for a Government guaranty of deposits. In addition to the initial fund, assessments upon the deposits of the banks sharing in the benefits of the fund are to bear the balance of the burden.

PRESENT SURPLUS FUNDS

The Federal reserve banks still have net profits of near $500,000,000. After taking $150,000,000 from their surplus funds, they would still have a surplus close to $150,000,000. The requirement of the Federal reserve banks in connection with the guaranty fund could not hamper the Federal reserve system.

ADEQUATE RESOURCES

Legislation establishing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was designed primarily to afford assistance to banks to revive confidence in them and to prevent a further breaking down of the banks of the country. Loans made by this corporation to assist in carrying out the purposes of this act are entirely proper and the board is authorized to borrow of it. For it is recognized that the success of any guaranty plan depends upon the assurance of the public that adequate resources are available to meet all demands.

Present conditions must not be accepted as permanent. They are a challenge to constructive leadership. Insurance is issued against every probable loss in countless fields. Insurance against loss of bank deposits must be included. [Applause.]

Mr. STEAGALL. I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the motion to strike out the paragraph.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 7. No member bank of the Federal reserve system shall pay interest at a greater rate than 4 per cent per annum with respect to any deposit made in such bank after the date of the enactment of this act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. What is the present rate of interest they are allowed to charge?

Mr. STEAGALL. There is no legally established rate. The purpose of this provision is to prevent any unfair practice on the part of one bank toward another bank, since we are undertaking to make deposits safe in all banks, the burden to be borne out of funds raised by assessments on all banks.

Mr. STAFFORD. Was it the purpose to determine the rate of interest that member banks are privileged to charge for loans?

Mr. STEAGALL. Oh, no; the provision refers to the interest to be paid on deposits only.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman know of any instance where member banks have ever paid more than 4 per cent on deposits?

Mr. STEAGALL. No; I do not. This is simply a safeguard against any improper practice on the part of a bank that might tend to pay an unfair rate as against a bank more conservatively conducted.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman inform the House the highest rate any bank has ever paid on deposits?

Mr. STEAGALL. I could not say. We have not that information, but it is a rare thing that as much as 4 per cent has ever been paid.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is a rare incident, so far as I know, that 3 per cent has ever been paid. Two per cent is the prevailing rate.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, in the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL], the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, a few moments ago, he called attention to a State in this Union, without naming it, and three bankers from that State—withholding their names—who came before the Banking and Currency Committee to speak in opposition to this bill. The State to which the gentleman referred is the State of Georgia. The gentlemen to whom he referred, who appeared before the Banking and Currency Committee are Messrs. Ronald Ransom, William S. Elliott, and Gordon L. Groover. However, the delegation of "big bankers" to whom he referred who came to see the State delegation were Messrs. Ransom, Elliott, and H. Lane Young.

Mr. Elliott is vice president of the Bank of Canton, Canton, Ga., a constituent of Congressman WOOD. He was at that time vice president of the Georgia Bankers Association and is now president of the Georgia Bankers Association. Mr. Ransom is vice president of the Fulton National Bank of Atlanta and was at that time president of the Georgia Bankers Association, a constituent of Congressman RAMSPECK. Mr. Groover is vice president of the Citizens & Southern National Bank of Savannah, a constituent of Congressman PARKER.

The bank of Canton, with which Mr. Elliott, from Judge WOOD'S district is connected, is a State bank not a member of the Federal reserve system.

The deposits, checking and savings, as of December 31, 1931, of Mr. Ransom's bank, the Fulton National, of Atlanta, are $14,620,613.

The deposits, checking and savings, of the First National Bank of Atlanta, which was not represented at this hearing, as of December 31, 1931, are $73,923,260.

The deposits, checking and savings, of the Citizens and Southern National Banks as of December 31, 1931, are $56,249,055.

If the Steagall bill becomes a law, the Fulton National Bank for the first year would have to pay $45,500, the First National Bank would have to pay $237,250, and the Citizens and Southern National Banks would have to pay $182,000.

These gentlemen did not come to Washington secretly and there is no mystery surrounding their visit. They made a request of Senator GEORGE for a hearing before the Georgia delegation relative to this Steagall bill, and a hearing was had in Judge CRISP'S office. Senator GEORGE and every member of the delegation were present. At this conference I assured these bankers that I would see to it that they would have an opportunity to appear before the Banking and Currency Committee before the subcommittee finished its hearings on the Steagall bill.

I had some difficulty in making my assurance effective because the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] told me he was in a hurry to report this bill out and suggested that instead of coming to Washington these bankers might send their statements. It appeared to me that the gentleman from Alabama was trying to put these gentlemen in the class of the hired and paid lobbyists who during this whole session have infested the halls of Congress, and against which the President and Congress have justly rebelled. I emphatically deny that these gentlemen have said, written, or otherwise done anything to justify the charge that they are lobbyists. I asked for this five minutes to deny the insinuation that either of the gentlemen from Georgia, all of whom are serving their State with success and with honor, are lobbyists or have done or written anything disreputable, and I deny it with vehemence.

Yet complaint is made because these gentlemen came to Washington in the interests of their banking institutions and the banking institutions of the State of Georgia to present their objections to the passage of the Steagall guaranty bill to the Banking and Currency Committee, the only tribunal before which they had the right to appear. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL] undertook to throw a veil of mystery over their visit to the Georgia delegation and to charge, by implication at least, that their purpose was more or less questionable, which charge is wholly unfounded.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. COX. I just wish to express my approval of every word the gentleman says.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I am obliged to the gentleman.

Mr. COX. I just wish to express approval of everything the gentleman says with respect to the activity of those gentlemen.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I am glad to hear the gentleman say that.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I again want to call attention to section 7 of this bill, and what it provides. It reads:

> No member bank of the Federal reserve system shall pay interest at a greater rate than 4 per cent per annum, with respect to any deposit made in such bank after the date of the enactment of this act.

That means that every bank which is a member of the Federal reserve system from the date of the passage of this act can not pay a rate of interest on deposits, in excess of 4 per cent.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McFADDEN. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are there not any number of instances where trust companies are paying a higher rate of interest than 4 per cent?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes, of course. There are eleven or twelve billion dollars on deposit in mutual savings banks, and the members of the Federal reserve system will not be able to compete with them. There are many savings banks outside of the Federal reserve system that are paying higher rates of interest.

Mr. STAFFORD. And this limit will virtually discourage them from continuing as member banks in the Federal reserve system?

Mr. McFADDEN. Yes. I just want the House to know what is being done in this particular section.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

All time has expired on this section.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. Whenever the Comptroller of the Currency finds that the continued service of any officer or director of any national bank is detrimental to the safe operation of such bank, he shall so certify to the Federal bank liquidating board. Not less than 30 days after such certification, such board shall hold a hearing of which such officer or director shall have reasonable notice and at which he shall have the right to be heard and be represented by counsel. If the board affirms the finding of the Comptroller of the Currency, the board shall by order requiring the removal of such officer or director notify the bank of which such officer or director is an officer or director. Such bank shall thereupon take such action as may be necessary to remove such officer or director.

Mr. DIES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DIES: Page 9, line 23, strike out section 9, beginning on line 23, of page 9, and ending on line 11, page 10, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Whenever the Comptroller of the Currency finds that the continued service of any officer or director of any national bank is detrimental to the safe operation of such bank, he shall so certify to the Federal bank liquidating board, and attach to such certification a detailed statement of facts upon which the Comptroller of the Currency bases his finding. A copy of such certification and attached statement shall be furnished at the same time to any such officer or director. Not less than 30 days after such certification such board shall hold a hearing of which such officer or director shall have reasonable notice, and at which he shall have the right to be heard and be represented by counsel. If the Comptroller of the Currency shall prove his finding, the board shall by order notify the bank of which such officer or director is an officer or director that it has sustained the finding of the Comptroller of the Currency and that such bank is required to immediately remove such officer or director or to furnish the board with such assurances as the board may require that such officer or director will desist from the conduct, acts, or omissions which the board has found is detrimental to the safe operation of such bank. If such bank shall fail to immediately furnish the board with such assurances as may be required by the board, such bank shall thereupon take such action as may be necessary to remove such officer or director."

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that the committee prefers the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES] to the existing provision of the bill. It accomplishes the same purpose, and we think the expression is more happy than the language in the bill.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute amendment, which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio is not a substitute amendment for the pending amendment.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CELLER: Page 10, line 12, add a new section called section 10:

"The Federal reserve act, as amended, is amended by inserting between sections 12 and 13 thereof the following new sections:

"'SEC. 12A. (a) There is hereby created a Federal open market committee (hereinafter referred to as the committee), which shall consist of as many members as there are Federal reserve districts. Each Federal reserve bank by its board of directors shall annually select one member of said committee. The meetings of said committee shall be held at Washington, D. C., at least four times each year, upon the call of the governor of the Federal Reserve Board or at the request of any three members of the committee, and, in the discretion of the board, may be attended by the members of the board.

"'(b) No Federal reserve bank shall engage in open-market operations under section 14 of this act.'"

Mr. LAGUARDIA (interrupting the reading of the amendment). Mr. Chairman, the Clerk has read enough to make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York makes a point of order. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. CELLER. Briefly, Mr. Chairman, the bill seeks to amend not only the national banking act but the Federal reserve act in many particulars. I need not go at length into how these purposes are accomplished. Suffice it to say there are many provisions of the Federal reserve act which are sought to be amended.

All I do by this amendment is to amend the Federal reserve act, in so far as it applies to open-market transactions, and set up a means by which the open-market transactions of the Federal reserve system may be accomplished.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is not germane to the general purpose of the bill. The amendment inserts into the Federal reserve act entirely new matter.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WOODRUM). The Chair is ready to rule.

The amendment undertakes to create a Federal open-market committee, which is in no way related to the subject matter of the present bill.

The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 201. There is hereby established a board to be known as the Federal bank liquidating board (hereinafter called the board), which shall consist of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Comptroller of the Currency, and three citizens of the United States appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Not more than one of the appointive members of the board shall be of the same political party as the President. The appointive members of the board shall hold their offices for a term of four years, except that a member appointed to fill a vacancy shall serve only for the unexpired portion of the term of the member whom he succeeds. Each appointive member shall receive a salary of $10,000 per annum, payable monthly. The appointive members of the board shall be ineligible, during the time they are in office and for one year thereafter, to hold any office, position, or employment in any member bank of the Federal reserve system or in or on the Federal Reserve Board. The board shall elect its own chairman and other officers, and is authorized to employ and fix the compensation of such officers, attorneys, agents, examiners, and employees of the board as it deems necessary, but the compensation of no such officer, attorney, agent, examiner, or employee shall be at a rate in excess of $10,000 per annum. The Secretary of the Treasury and the Comptroller of the Currency shall receive no compensation for service as members of the board. All expenses of the board shall be paid out of the fund by the board, under rules and regulations prescribed by the board.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri: Page 11, line 7, after the word "employ," strike out the words "and fix the compensation of" and insert the following: "in accordance with the classification act of 1923, as amended," and on line 9, after the word "necessary," strike out the comma, insert a period, and strike out the remainder of the sentence, so that the sentence will read: "The board shall elect its own chairman and other officers, and is authorized to employ, in accordance with the classification act of 1923, as amended, such officers, attorneys, agents, examiners, and employees of the board as it deems necessary."

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, much has been said in reference to confidence—confidence of the people in the stability of our financial institutions. I think the people would have much more confidence in the board you seek to create by the bill if the employees of this board are not politically hand picked. This section permits the selection of employees without regard to civil service. Lump-sum appropriations generally mean a return to the old system of rewarding the faithful. You want real experienced employees for work of this character.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I notice the bill as written calls for $10,000 salaries. We have done a lot of trimming here to get $10,000 salaries down a little. Does the gentleman's amendment accomplish that?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. It certainly should do a little trimming.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does it make civil-service employees out of the new board?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. As written it certainly does not, because they are not going to be subject to civil service unless that is provided. The board should not be subject to civil service, but the other employees should.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the gentleman's amendment provide the rates of pay for the different classifications?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. It provides for rates of pay in that the present classification act applies. This will require them to take their stenographers, agents, and other employees from the civil-service rolls.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Then, what happens to the proposed $10,000 salaries?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I can not speak for the members of the board. They will fix salaries to suit themselves for the employees if my amendment is not adopted.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Could not Congress prevent that?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I am seeking to prevent it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am with the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri) there were—ayes 10, noes 48.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McFADDEN: Page 10, line 12, strike out all of section 201, Title II, down to and including line 15, on page 11.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, this is the amendment I referred to and which I said I would offer when we got to this particular stage in the reading of the bill. It is coupled with the amendment which I offered and which was voted down. This goes to the very vitals of the bill. This is the section which creates the board to administer the guaranty fund. I do not know that I need to discuss it any further than that. The membership of the committee knows I am unalterably opposed to this particular provision in the bill. I have already stated many of the reasons why I am opposed to it. I want to reiterate that what you are doing here is to strike the worst blow ever administered to your Federal reserve system.

I want to call upon those members of the committee who claim to represent the administration, who are not apparently interested in the preservation of the Federal reserve system or in the protection of the United States Treasury—I want to say to them this is a crucial period and they should be interested in this bill. So far as I am able to ascertain, there is not one member of the administration in favor of this bill, yet we find on these motions which I have been making to defeat the bill many members on the administration side voting for the bill.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I am somewhat taken by surprise when my good friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] speaks for the administration. Somebody is spoofing somebody. It was not so long ago that we had to protect the gentleman from administration onslaughts.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. McFADDEN. I am with the administration when I consider it is right and I am against it when I think it is wrong.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I copyrighted that statement yesterday. Seriously, I know the gentleman from Pennsylvania is sincere. I just do not agree with him in this instance. The President of the United States, as just quoted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMPBELL]—and I inserted it in the RECORD yesterday—has repeatedly stated to Congress in special messages and in statements throughout the country that we must safeguard the interests of the depositors, that we must revise our banking laws in order to safeguard the interest of depositors.

Gentlemen, I can not understand how there can be any opposition to the principles laid down in this bill. I submit that if anyone has any bona fide perfecting amendment to offer the committee will be glad to consider it, but up to date the amendments which have been offered only attempt to load down the bill seeking its defeat.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania has just moved to strike out the very heart of the bill. This is a test vote, and it seems to me that in all fairness and according to all parliamentary rules, if the gentleman is defeated in this amendment, he ought to join in and help to perfect the bill so we can pass this bill.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. McFADDEN. In this bill you are attempting to do the impossible. No insurance company in the United States or group of insurance companies in the United States which are familiar with this class of business, or surety companies, will undertake it because of the risk and hazard.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Gentlemen, if it is impossible to secure depositors in the banks of the United States then we might as well close the banks of the United States. [Applause.] Are we to enact banking laws and bank inspectors and appropriate billions of dollars—all for the bankers and no protection to depositors? The gentleman states that no insurance company would undertake to insure these deposits. Of course not. Why? Because no insurance company would have the right of visitation and inspection while the Federal Government has the right of visitation, inspection, control, and supervision. Gentlemen, to my mind it is just as important that the Government shall have that power of constant supervision and regulation over banks as it is to insure the depositors. This is the first opportunity we have had to place the powerful hand of the Government over these banks, and when they deviate from the requirements set forth by this board they are taken out of the system, and any bank taken out of the system means the end of that bank.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Moreover, under the provisions of section 9 of this bill, it is provided that any official engaged in the management of a bank found to be incompetent may be removed upon investigation by the Government.

Mr. LaGUARDIA. And what will happen to some of these security-mongers who are passing themselves off as bankers? They will be kicked out of banking circles immediately.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. McFADDEN. Is the gentleman claiming there will be any better supervision than we have had over national banks under the Federal reserve system?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. I do claim that, absolutely.

Mr. McFADDEN. In what particular and how will it be improved?

Mr. LaGUARDIA. Because it is the duty of the guarantee board to watch the banks and every other bank is assessed to pay for the delinquencies of any other bank, and the pressure will be so tremendous that there will not only be better supervision and inspection but examinations will be made at closer intervals, and that is going to do more than anything written into the law up to date to make our banks secure.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I offer a perfecting amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: Page 10, line 25, strike out "$10,000" and insert "$9,000."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, this paragraph establishes another board with several members who are to receive pay. The bill as written proposes that they shall receive more pay than is likely to be received by Members of Congress after we have completed the economy program. The members of this so-called liquidating board are to be appointed for four years. The services they will perform, if they are performed well, can not be measured in pay and, perhaps, should be much more than $10,000, but inasmuch as there will be no difficulty in finding candidates, I have offered an amendment to reduce the amount of pay of each member to $9,000 instead of $10,000.

If this amendment is adopted, I shall offer another perfecting amendment to line 11, on page 11, where it is provided that the employees, officers, agents, examiners, and so forth, under this board shall be employed at a rate not in excess of $10,000, and I shall propose to make that figure $8,000, because I am satisfied you can get all the employees, attorneys, examiners, and so on, who will be glad to have the places, and who will perform the duties well for less than the $10,000 proposed as a maximum.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Washington.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—ayes 55, noes 33.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. Page 10, line 21, strike out "four" and insert "six," and after the word "that" in line 22, insert the language of the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 10, line 21, strike out the word "four" and insert the word "six"; and in line 22, after the word "that," insert "the members first appointed shall hold office, respectively, for 2, 4, and 6 years as designated by the President and that."

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is simply one affecting the mechanics of the bill with reference to the term of the officers of the board, and it is entirely satisfactory to the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chariman, I offer another amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JOHNSON of Washington: Page 11, line 11, strike out "$10,000" and insert "$8,000."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, this amendment applies to the employees, examiners, agents, attorneys, and so forth, of the board, and $8,000 is enough. I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McKEOWN: Page 11, line 15, after the word "board," insert:

"Before the board shall sell the assets of any failed bank at private sale, the same shall be appraised and the price received shall not be less than two-thirds of the appraisement."

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to forestall the gentleman's remarks——

Mr. McKEOWN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STEAGALL. But I may say that I think the amendment improves the bill in that it throws an additional safeguard around the administration of the assets of a closed bank. The amendment is very sound and is promotive of good management. There is no objection to the amendment.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. HARLAN. The gentleman's amendment does not provide a method of appraisement. If we are going to provide for an appraisement, should not the bill specify whether there are to be two appraisers or one appraiser or just how the appraisement is to be made?

Mr. McKEOWN. The board can appraise the assets.

Mr. HARLAN. Then they ought to be given that authority.

Mr. McKEOWN. They have general authority to make the appraisement, and they will undoubtedly appraise the assets properly. This is what causes almost all the trouble in these failed banks.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to strike out the section.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 202. (a) There is hereby established a fund to be known as the Federal guaranty fund for depositors in member banks of the Federal reserve system (called the "fund" in this title). There shall be paid into such fund by the United States Treasury an amount equal to the entire sums heretofore paid to the United States as franchise tax by the Federal reserve banks. The board shall, as soon as practicable after the enactment of this act, require each Federal reserve bank to pay into the fund an amount which bears the same ratio to $150,000,000 as the surplus of such bank on December 31, 1931, bears to the total surplus of all Federal reserve banks on December 31, 1931. The board shall also require the payment into the fund by the member banks of the Federal reserve system of such amount (not to exceed $100,000,000) as may be fixed by the board, of which each such bank shall pay an amount which bears the same ratio to the sum fixed by the board as the average deposits of such bank during the preceding calendar year bear to the average deposits of all member banks during the preceding calendar year.

(b) At any time after 12 months after the payment of sums required to be paid under subsection (a), if, in the judgment of the board, the sums in the fund are inadequate to carry out the provisions of this title, the board is authorized to require the member banks of the Federal reserve system to pay annually into the fund the whole or any part of $100,000,000. Each bank shall pay an amount which bears the same ratio to $100,000,000 (or such part thereof as may be fixed by the board) as the average deposits of such bank during the preceding calendar year bear to the average deposits of all member banks during the preceding calendar year.

(c) Sums payable by a Federal reserve bank or by a member bank under this section shall be subject to call in whole or in part by the board at such times and in such amounts as may be fixed by the board, except that amounts assessed against member banks shall be payable in instalments of not more than 25 per cent of the assessment.

(d) If at any time there are in the funds sums in excess of $500,000,000, if, in the judgment of the board such excess sums are not necessary to carry out the provisions of this title, the board shall refund to each bank contributing to the last annual contribution to the fund an amount which bears the same ratio to such excess as the last annual contribution of such bank bears to the entire last annual contribution of all banks.

(e) Sums in the fund shall be invested only in such interest-bearing direct obligations of the Government of the United States as the board determines, or non-interest-bearing deposits in member banks of the Federal reserve system.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section. I do that for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee if it has been figured up what the cost of this insurance is going to be and who is going to pay the cost, the depositors or the Government?

Mr. STEAGALL. The gentleman must understand that this is in no sense a Government guaranty bill. The only fund which the Government is required to advance is a part of the initial fund, and the amount is the earnings of Federal reserve banks that were paid into the Treasury in lieu of a franchise tax. Later annual assessments may be levied against member banks of the Federal reserve system to raise $100,000,000 annually to be called for as the board may find it necessary.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Making the round figures a half a billion fund; but who is going to pay the cost of the insurance, the depositors?

Mr. STEAGALL. Assessments will be made on banks in the sum of $100,000,000 based on deposits. The deposits in the banks amount to a little over $50,000,000,000. About $20,000,000,000 of that are in member banks of the Federal system and the balance is in nonmember banks. It will amount to one-quarter of 1 per cent, will it not? I have not figured it.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. That would be 25 cents per hundred.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is right.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I have been trying to get some one in authority to state what those figures were as to the cost of insurance.

Mr. STEVENSON. A billion-dollar fund would require $2,500 as an initial fund.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I have been told that the cost would be from 5 cents a hundred dollars to 50 cents. I have been informed by insurance companies that have experience in this insurance that the cheapest rate was 50 cents per hundred dollars, and up to $1.50 per hundred. If those insurance companies can not make a profit out of 50 cents per hundred surely you are not going to be able to insure for 5 or 25 cents a hundred, even if you spread it out over all of the whole bank deposits of the United States.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I yield.

Mr. McFADDEN. Has the gentleman any assurance that the banks that are going to be assessed will not pass it on to the customers?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. My understanding is from the statement of the gentleman from South Carolina that the depositors are going to pay for this.

Mr. STEVENSON. Oh, no.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Let the gentleman from Alabama answer.

Mr. STEAGALL. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I said it was going to be made on a basis of the deposits in banks.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Who is going to pay it?

Mr. STEAGALL. The banks.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. And they will not be permitted to deduct it from the deposits?

Mr. STEAGALL. Oh, no.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Where is it so stated in the bill?

Mr. STEAGALL. That is quite clear. There is no dispute about it. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto be closed in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. PATMAN: Page 11, line 19, commencing with the word "there," strike out the remainder of that sentence down to and including the word "banks" in line 22.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, that amendment is intended to strike out the appropriation of $147,126,882. I see no reason why that appropriation should be made directly from the Treasury at this time. It occurs to me, if this bill is to become a law, it should be made effective, say, 6 months or 12 months from now. We should not make this bill effective immediately, and in the event of its passage all banks, State banks, should be given an opportunity to get into the system on equal terms with the national banks. If the bill passes as it is now written, it will not be a law guaranteeing deposits for all banks, but it will guarantee deposits for only 8,000 banks, and there are 20,000 banks in the country. Twelve thousand banks will not be affected in any way, shape, or form. In order that the 12,000 banks may get into the system it will be necessary for application to be made to the Comptroller of the Currency. The Comptroller of the Currency will then have an examination made of the 12,000 banks, or of such number of banks as desire to come into the guaranty system, and if the examination is satisfactory to the Comptroller of the Currency, then and in that event only will this guaranty fund be applicable to the deposits in those 12,000 banks.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PATMAN. Yes.

Mr. STEAGALL. We have specifically agreed on an amendment which permits every State bank to come in on terms of equality and equal assessment.

Mr. PATMAN. Without examination?

Mr. STEAGALL. Upon certificate of the examining authorities of the State in which the bank does business.

Mr. PATMAN. The gentleman will offer that?

Mr. STEAGALL. It is already in the bill, but language perfecting it will be offered.

Mr. PATMAN. We should grant sufficient length of time for them to come in and raise the money in another way rather than by appropriating it direct from the Treasury of the United States. I think this provision making this appropriation should be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. All time has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 204. Upon approval by the board of the estimate and report of the committee, on the basis of such estimate, or, if modified by the board, on the basis of such modified estimate (but not later than 90 days after certification of insolvency), the board shall pay to each depositor whose outstanding deposit is $1,000 or less, not less than 50 per cent of such deposit, and to each depositor whose outstanding deposit exceeds $1,000, not less than 25 per cent of such depositor's outstanding deposit, or $500, whichever is the greater. Within six months after the first payment, the board shall pay to each depositor whose outstanding deposit is $1,000 or less the difference between the amount of his deposit and the amount paid under the next preceding sentence. Within six months after payment has been made under the preceding sentence all depositors the amount of whose deposits are still unpaid shall be paid not less than 25 per cent of such deposits, and within six months thereafter the amounts of all depositors' deposits shall be paid in full.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STEVENSON: Amend on line 7, page 15, by adding at the end of the line the following words: "When the board shall have paid off the depositors it shall be subrogated to all of the rights of the depositors against the assets and all parties liable to such depositors."

Mr. STEVENSON. In other words, when the board pays off the depositors, it is subrogated to the rights of the depositors as to the assets.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Does that include interest or just the actual deposit put into the bank by the depositor when the bank becomes insolvent?

Mr. STEAGALL. That is expected to be a matter of legal construction; but there can not be any question that interest is paid at the rate prescribed in the State where the bank operates.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 206. In the case of the insolvency of a member bank of the Federal reserve system which is not a national bank, the board shall request the receiver or liquidating agent of such bank to submit to the board a report and estimate containing the same matter as that required in the case of a report and estimate of the committee provided for in section 203. For the purposes of this section, the board shall have power, at any time, by its own examiners or otherwise, to make such examinations of any such insolvent bank as the board deems necessary. Upon approval of such report and estimate, the board shall proceed to pay to the receiver or liquidating agent amounts equal to the amounts which would have been paid to depositors under section 204 in the case of a national bank. The sums paid by the board under this section shall be paid at the times and in the amounts provided by section 204, but such sums shall be paid to the receiver or liquidating agent in trust for the depositors.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. As the gavel fell when I was speaking before, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BRAND] very kindly handed me page 11220 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of May 25, where his estimate based upon the detail of this bill indicated that the assessment or insurance fee to furnish the insurance fund would be 0.00325 per cent $100 of bank deposits, based upon the total deposits upon December 31, 1931, of $30,746,386. Inasmuch as the maximum insurance fund used in that computation to be raised annually was a constant fund of $200,000,000, the conclusion is that as deposits increased the annual payment would decrease. And this without any regard to the amount of losses or the number of bank failures, so that the statement that the insurance fee would be 25 cents per $100, made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STEAGALL], shows that he expects that the deposits will be larger. I wish I had the time to discuss this matter further, but as I want to mention another matter, I will let my preceding comment stand.

The gentleman who last spoke referred to inspiring confidence by this and other legislation. I say to you gentlemen, who are just as serious in considering this legislation as I am, that I would like protection along the line of insuring bank deposits, whether it is at the cost of the bank or the depositor. When you brought out this bill and used the word "insurance" I began to think you were going to give us some actual insurance and furnish an insurance or other basis, so that the bank deposits might be properly guaranteed or insured, but in looking over your plan I submit that you have not presented anything that is insurance. Insurance denotes safety and accuracy. You present matters here which are guesswork and hypothetical.

When the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MAY] spoke yesterday, I tried to direct attention to where some of this lack of confidence was coming from. I think instead of inspiring confidence, you are inspiring more lack of confidence by this and other bills. First of all, on the one hand, you inspired the Federal reserve banks to buy Government bonds from and load money into the banks to inspire confidence and thus try to force more money into circulation.

Then, on the other hand, the banks also have to consider the Comptroller of the Currency and his coming around every once in a while to look into the note case. His examiner looks over the contents and says, "Those notes are not good. Those notes are bad. Your securities have depreciated so much." How much? Nobody will say. It is a secret. The comptroller keeps the bankers scared with his comments and the Federal reserve bank keeps them scared with its suggestions and requirements. The Federal reserve bank says "Get more money out into circulation." The banker wants to do whatever is right, but he must play safe. He can not make the loans which are requested. The greatest number of requests will violate every rule of safety which he has learned in his long experience. He does not know what he is going to be required or asked to do next, but at all times he must keep his bills receivable in no worse shape than they were at the last examination. I know what it means to collect money and I know what good paper is and and what is bad paper.

These things tend to scare the banks more and more. Their fright is communicated by action if not by word to the customer and in turn it premeates the entire business community and through them it reaches all the people. The banks do not know what Congress will do next to cause the Federal reserve bank to tell them to make more loans and put out more money in circulation. They do not know how they can justify their new loans to the Comptroller of the Currency. When the loans can not be justified and the percentage reaches a figure covered by a rule of his department, then comes the question of closing the bank. In this House I have heard the comptroller criticized because he has not closed more banks and because he failed to close some banks at an earlier date. He has had to use his best judgment and has realized the situation confronting all banking institutions, large and small. The figures show many banks to be as solvent to-day as they were at the last examination. The paper examined is practically the same as it was three or six months ago. That paper, whether as notes or as security, is exactly the same. The values are less and the appraisal is made by values over which neither the comptroller nor the bank can have any control. What can the banker do?

You now propose to insure the bank deposits and to create a fund out of moneys in the United States Treasury to make the initial fund or capital. But that does not furnish any basis for further confidence. It might be said that all banks that have weathered the storm up to the present time will probably survive. I believe that to be true, but we all know that there are a number of them which, if the appraisal of their assets were to be insisted upon as showing solvency or insolvency, would have to admit the latter as being more nearly correct. And so the comptroller, realizing that the paper is the same as before, admits some preceding figures of appraisal and permits the institution to continue with open doors. As a matter of figures, those banks are all sound. As a matter of revaluation, many may not be. The insurance of the deposits in their possession does not remedy this situation. If it were a fact, a true insurance and reliance might be placed upon repayment of every cent on deposit in every bank, a feeling of security as to deposits might be secured, but always there is still present that fear of what is going to be done next and how is the business of the country going to revive. And when will the revival commence? How slow or how fast will it be?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Colorado has expired.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 208. Any bank which is not a member of the Federal reserve system which has a capital and surplus of $25,000 or more may, with the approval of the board, contribute to the fund and upon insolvency of such bank the provisions of section 206 shall apply with respect to payments to the depositors of such bank. The board shall not permit any such bank to contribute to such fund except after examination of such bank by the board and a determination by the board that such bank is in sound financial condition, and the board shall require of such bank as a condition to the privilege of contributing to the fund that such bank shall submit to examination by the board at any time: Provided, however, That for a period not exceeding three years after the passage of this act banks that are not members of the Federal reserve system shall be permitted to contribute to the fund and to share in the benefits provided in section 206 upon certificate of the duly constituted State examining authorities that such bank is in sound financial condition.

Each such bank shall pay into the fund an initial contribution equal to twice the amount paid under section 202 (a) by a member bank of the same amount of deposits and such annual contributions as may thereafter be required and the amount of each contribution shall be twice the amount paid under section 202 (b) by a member bank. Sums payable by any bank under this section shall be subject to call in whole or in part by the board at such times and in such amounts as may be fixed by the board except that amounts assessed against such banks shall be payable in installments of not more than 25 per cent of the assessment. The board may at any time require any such bank to withdraw from participation in the benefits of the fund or to go into liquidation and receive the benefits of such participation. Upon withdrawal from participation the board shall pay such bank an amount which bears the same ratio to the amount paid by such bank under the last annual contribution as the number of months remaining in the year since the time such contribution was required bears to 12.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I have sent to the desk.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I had prepared an amendment, the effect of which is to permit State banks to share in the guaranty fund upon paying the requisite assessments, upon a certificate of good health from the State examining authority. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MCGUGIN] has prepared an amendment to accomplish the same purpose, and I think the gentleman's amendment is better worded and accomplishes the purpose in a better way than the amendment I had prepared, and so I am glad to accept the gentleman's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MCGUGIN: Page 16, line 19, strike out all of section 208 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 208. Any bank which is not a member of the Federal reserve system may contribute to the fund and upon insolvency of such bank, the provisions of section 206 shall apply with respect to payments of the depositors of such banks. The board shall not permit any such bank to contribute to such fund except that such bank presents a certificate from the duly constituted State examining authorities that such bank is in a sound financial condition. As a condition to the privilege of any such bank contributing to the fund, the board may demand that any such bank shall semi-annually or annually submit to the board a certificate of the duly constituted State examining authorities that such bank is in a sound financial condition.

"Each such bank shall pay into the fund an initial contribution the amount paid under section 202 by a member bank of the same deposits and such annual contributions as thereafter be required and in the same amount as the contributions which are to be made under section 202 by a member bank. Sums payable by any bank under this section shall be subject to call in whole or in part at such times and in such amounts as may be fixed by the board except that amount assessed against such banks shall be payable in installments of not more than 25 per cent of the assessment. At any time such bank falls to furnish certificate from the duly constituted State examining authorities that such bank is in a sound financial condition, the board may require such bank to withdraw from participation from the benefits of the fund or to go into liquidation and receive the benefits of such participation. Upon withdrawal from participation, the board shall pay such bank an amount which bears the same ratio to the amount paid by such bank under the last annual contribution as the number of months remaining in the year since the time such contribution was required bears to 12."

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane. I notice in section 208 it is stated that the board shall not permit any such bank to contribute to such fund except after examination of such bank by the board, and a determination by the board that such bank is in sound financial condition. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas is clearly not germane because it goes around what is contemplated by that section and allows these banks to enter simply on a certificate.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WOODRUM). The Chair would call attention to lines 10, 11, and 12 of the bill, which provide that the examination of the bank shall show that the bank is in sound financial condition. The amendment does the same thing.

Mr. GOSS. But as the Clerk read the amendment, the banks do not have to submit to any examination under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment reads:

At any time such bank fails to furnish certificate from the duly constituted State examining authorities that bank is in a sound financial condition.

Mr. GOSS. But that has nothing to do with the Federal Reserve Board, which the bill sets out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment deals with the same subject matter. The Chair, therefore, overrules the point of order.

Does the gentleman from Kansas desire to be heard on his amendment?

Mr. McGUGIN. I do not.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. I am opposed to this amendment which was agreed upon last night, originally introduced by the distinguished chairman of the committee, and I am likewise opposed to the last amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MCGUGIN] for practically the same reason. There is dynamite in this little amendment. There were many old heads brought together in order to consider and frame an amendment which would remove one of the great objections I urged in my address against this bill. This conference succeeded in changing some votes.

The amendment agreed upon by this conference is as follows:

Any bank which is not a member of the Federal reserve system shall be permitted to contribute—

A great concession to a nonmember bank to be permitted to be taxed—to the fund and share in the benefits provided in section 206.

Upon what terms?

Upon a certificate of the duly constituted State examining authorities that such bank is in sound financial condition.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. If the gentleman will give me more time, I will be glad to do it.

Mr. STEVENSON. I will only ask a question. The House can give the time.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I will not yield unless the gentleman will give me time.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is the gentleman opposed to State banks being allowed to come into this guaranty system on an equality with the member banks?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I will answer the question.

Mr. STEVENSON. That is the question that I wanted to ask. The gentleman is not answering the question.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I will answer the question if you will just give me time.

Mr. STEVENSON. I will give you all the time you need.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I will hold the gentleman to that.

The amendment applies to and can be divided into four classes of banks. The first class is nonmember banks, who will not apply for membership in the Federal reserve system. There is a good number of this class who will not apply for membership because they do not receive any interest on their reserve fund in the Federal reserve bank if they become members and because they lose the right to make a service charge on the checks passing through their banks. The second class of nonmember banks are those who apply and pass. The third class are those who apply and do not pass. What in the name of common sense is going to become of the nonmember State banks of the country, including banks in your State and mine, for instance, who fail to pass under the proposed amendments? One member of the banking department in a State may exercise all power to say whether a bank is in sound financial condition or not. In the first place, the amendment empowers the banking superintendent or officer of a State to refuse an application for any reason and upon any ground he sees fit without giving the applying bank an opportunity to be heard. There is no provision in the amendment that requires the State authorities to give the bank a hearing as to its financial condition, and there is no provision for an appeal if the application is turned down. When a bank's application is refused and the bank is declared to be not in a sound financial condition and this decision reaches the depositors, a run on the bank by its depositors will begin, resulting in closing the bank.

The fourth class is the outlawed class, the banks of $25,000 capitalization and under. This class of banks can not become members of the Federal reserve system under the law, and therefore Congress can not include this class of banks within the scope of the operations of this bill. There are 50 banks in Georgia having a capital of $25,000 or under You might as well wipe them out of the picture entirely.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object—and, of course, I shall not object—in this instance I am going to permit it, but I shall object to any further extensions of time.

There was no objection.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. If the gentleman from Alabama includes himself, then I am willing to stand by this gag law.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. PETTENGILL. The gentleman expressed some fear as to what would happen to State banks that apply and do not pass.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. PETTENGILL. Does the gentleman think a State bank should remain open when the State bank examiners do not certify it to be in a sound financial condition?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Why, no. But as soon as the depositors hear the bank has been turned down because it is not in a sound financial condition, the depositors will make a run on the bank just as fast as they can get to the doors of the bank. Does not the gentleman know that?

Mr. PETTENGILL. No.

Mr. McGUGIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. McGUGIN. If a condition of insolvency existed in a bank and it was discovered by the examiners, they would close it of their own motion. There is no chance for a run on it.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. Whenever depositors hear a bank is in an unsound condition they will take their money out of it, if there is any money left for them to get.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. GARBER. The gentleman is a lawyer, and I am satisfied his legal opinion is worth considering.

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I am much obliged.

Mr. GARBER. Has the gentleman investigated to ascertain whether or not it would require local authority from the State—that is, an authorization from the State—for the State bank to enter into the guaranty provision of the bill as an assessment is authorized upon the deposits of the banks?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I have not; but I may say to the gentleman from Oklahoma, who is one of the fairest and ablest Members of this House, that under the terms of the proposed amendments that no nonmember bank can obtain the benefits of this guaranty fund unless the State banking authorities certify that the bank is in a sound financial condition.

I contend that the amendment is not efficacious. It does not relieve the main objections against the bill. It leaves the State banks not members of the Federal reserve system subject to the decision of the State authorities and therefore in a state of fear and uneasiness, due to the fact that such banks would not know, if they applied for membership in the Federal reserve system, whether their application would be favorably acted upon or not.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. HANCOCK of North Carolina. Does the gentleman think this initial fund would last long enough, after the member banks have been taken in and guaranteed, for a single State bank to participate in the guaranty fund?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I do not. If one of the banks of Atlanta or one of the banks of Savannah, or a bank in New York, or a great bank in Philadelphia or Baltimore failed, it would entirely wipe out this fund.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. The bill provides for a satisfactory certificate of inspection before admission to the system. Suppose banks were given a satisfactory certificate one year and the next year they were not admitted to participation in the fund, can this board turn them aside, pay them their pro rata share, and turn them out without liquidating them, under the provisions of the amendment?

Mr. BRAND of Georgia. I think so; and when the board excludes them there will be no liquidation—there will be insolvency.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that on this amendment we have the right to five minutes on each side.

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to close debate is in order after there has been debate on an amendment, and the motion is not debatable. The gentleman from Alabama moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto do now close.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMSON) there were—ayes 75, noes 45.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. McGUGIN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 209. (a) Until January 22, 1934, the board is authorized to borrow of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation such sums as the board may deem necessary to carry out the provisions of this title. The board may be indebted to the corporation up to a maximum of $500,000,000 at any one time.

(b) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall make such loans to the board as from time to time may be applied for by the board, and applications by the board shall be preferred above all other applications and shall be expedited in every way possible. No security shall be required for any such loan, but each loan shall bear such rate of interest as may be agreed upon by the board and the corporation. Each such loan shall provide for the repayment by the board of the amount loaned by installment payments. The board is authorized to repay such loans out of sums received under section 202. All such loans shall be payable in full not later than January 22, 1942.

(c) For the purposes of this section, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall issue such notes, debentures, bonds, and other obligations as may be necessary. Such notes, debentures, bonds, and other obligations shall be issued under the provisions and subject to the limitations of section 9 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee his construction of paragraph (c). Are the notes, debentures, and bonds authorized to be issued by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in addition to those that are authorized to be issued under the original act?

Mr. STEAGALL. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then they come within the expansion of three times the capital stock and out of it?

Mr. STEAGALL. That is the purpose.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If there are no further amendments, under the rule the committee rises.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WOODRUM, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11362) to amend the national banking act and the Federal reserve act, and to provide a guaranty fund for depositors in banks, and, pursuant to House Resolution 221, he reported the bill back to the House with sundry amendments.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman opposed to the bill?

Mr. McFADDEN. I am.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion to recommit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. McFADDEN moves to recommit the bill (H. R. 11362) to the Committee on Banking and Currency, with instructions to report it back forthwith with the following amendments:

On page 7, beginning with line 13, strike out the whole of section 5, down to and including line 15, on page 8.

On page 10, beginning with line 12, strike out the whole of Title II down to and including line 16, on page 19.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to recommit.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Thirty-nine Members have risen, not a sufficient number.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the other side.

The SPEAKER. Those opposed to taking this vote by the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] One hundred and eighty-nine Members have risen in opposition.

So the yeas and nays were refused.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a division.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania demands the yeas and nays. Those in favor of ordering the yeas and nays will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Thirty-eight Members have risen, not a sufficient number.

So the yeas and nays were refused.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. STEAGALL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn. I withhold that motion for the present, Mr. Speaker.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. SHALLENBERGER, indefinitely, on account of accident.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington, for to-day, on account of illness in family.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS—RECORD IN THE FIRST SESSION OF THE SEVENTY-SECOND CONGRESS

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, the first session of the Seventy-second Congress is rapidly drawing to a close.

I regard a public office as a public trust, and in order that my attitude on all public questions may be made known to the people of my district, so that I may not be misrepresented, I desire briefly to enumerate some of my efforts and to submit them to the people of my district for their consideration. It is a great responsibility to represent one of the splendid districts of Oklahoma, and I greatly appreciate the privilege. The State is comparatively new, which necessitates the giving of much attention to local matters peculiarly affecting it.

Through speeches, correspondence, and the press I am sure the people of my district are familiar with the record I have made in their behalf, the attention I have given to correspondence, departmental work, and local legislation, as well as the larger questions affecting the people of the Nation as a whole.

Oklahoma is rich in natural resources and its citizenship is drawn from every State of the Union. I have done everything possible during my service in Congress to encourage and further its development.

THE MAJOR QUESTIONS CONSIDERED

The present session of Congress has been the most difficult in which I have seen service, not excepting the Congress during the World War. When Congress convened conditions were unprecedented. The depression, which was world-wide, continued. Our entire business structure, embracing all classes, was threatened. Financial conditions had gone from bad to worse. There were more bank failures in 1931 than in any other year of our history. There were 1,049 bank failures during the last three months of 1931; 522 during the month of October, 1931; 353 in December; and 2,291 failures, with deposits of $1,759,000,000, during the entire year of 1931.

The farmers of the country were bankrupt. They were unable to pay taxes, mortgages, and other obligations, and many farms had been abandoned. It is estimated there were more than 8,000,000 people out of employment and untold thousands were supported from public funds or through charitable organizations.

Railroad companies were reported in dire distress and thousands of employees dismissed. Insurance companies, in which the people of the country hold 70,000,000 policies, were in need of financial assistance. Savings banks, in which people had stored the savings of a lifetime, were threatened. Bank deposits during the past two years had been reduced from fifty-five billion to forty-six billion dollars. Because of bad business conditions the Federal revenues had decreased far below the amount necessary to meet Government expenses. Under these circumstances emergency legislation designed to stabilize conditions was imperative.

Congress met on December 7, 1931, and the Democrats organized the House by a slender thread. The President and Senate were of the opposite political party.

The committees of the House were organized on December 15, 1931, and immediately set to work in nonpartisan cooperation to prepare and report legislation to stabilize conditions and restore confidence.

THE RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

The Banking and Currency Committees of the Senate and House held hearings during the Christmas holidays in 1931, and both committees unanimously recommended the reconstruction finance bill.

It passed the Senate January 11, 1932, by a vote of 63 to 8, and passed the House January 15, 1932, by a vote of 335 to 55.

The bill created a corporation similar to the War Finance Corporation. It has a membership of seven, including the Secretary of the Treasury, the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, the Farm Loan Commissioner, and four additional members nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate.

The bill authorized an appropriation of $500,000,000 to be subscribed by the Secretary of the Treasury and the board of directors of the corporation is authorized to issue notes, bonds, debentures, or other obligations in the sum of three times this capital.

The purpose of the bill is to aid in financing agriculture, commerce, and industry, and authorizes loans to be made to different classes of institutions, with a special provision that $50,000,000, with an expansion of three times that amount, making an aggregate of $200,000,000, shall be allocated to the Secretary of Agriculture "for the purpose of making loans or advancements to farmers" under rules and regulations of the Secretary of Agriculture. The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to make loans on first-lien crop mortgages where no other security can be given. This provision was inserted to enable farmers with no other security to finance themselves during the 1932 crop season.

All loans were to be adequately secured; and Gen. Charles G. Dawes, chairman of the corporation, in an extended statement before the House Ways and Means Committee, reviewing the purposes of the bill and its administration under his supervision, reports that all loans have been made "upon adequate security," and that he expects them all to be repaid, and that he expects no loss to result to the Government.

He characterized in lurid language as "damned demagogues" those who misrepresent the purposes of the bill and its administration for political purposes.

The Secretary of Agriculture reports loans made to farmers, as of May 13, 1932, in the sum of $63,344,103, and of this amount loans were made to farmers in Oklahoma in the sum of $590,524.

Additional loans have been made to farmers through intermediate-credit banks, agricultural-credit corporations, and livestock-credit corporations in an amount which will increase the total loans to farmers out of this fund to more than $75,000,000.

As a result of this legislation General Dawes reports a great decline in bank failures, the gradual stabilization of business conditions, and that it has had the effect of measurably restoring confidence.

Second. Legislation is introduced and pending to enlarge the lending powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans to all classes, including States, counties, municipalities, and individuals, and increasing its authority to expand its credit through notes, bonds, debentures, or other obligations for this purpose in an aggregate amount of $3,000,000,000. The corporation, from this fund, is directed to make loans in financing sales of accumulated agricultural products in foreign markets to relieve the depressed prices in domestic markets.

This same bill authorizes $100,000,000 to be expended by the President through such agencies as he may select to care for the destitute. It provides for an extensive public-building program, improvement of rivers and harbors, flood control, and road work to aid the unemployment situation.

Third. The Glass-Steagall bill was enacted to extend larger rediscount privileges to banks to make local assets more liquid, dispel fear, bring money out of hoarding, increase the money in circulation, and enable the local banks to extend loans to customers of all classes.

Fourth. Congress enacted the Goldsborough bill directing the Federal reserve banks to raise and retain the commodity price level.

Fifth. The Federal farm loan act was amended by authorizing the appropriation of an additional sum of $125,000,000 to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to subscribe for additional stock in any Federal land bank, with the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board, and of this amount $25,000,000 is to be used exclusively for the purpose of supplying any Federal land bank with funds to use in its operations in place of any amounts the bank may be deprived of by reason of extensions made to farmers. This provision was inserted to prevent wholesale foreclosures and was a legislative direction to the banks to grant extensions to farmers and provide the funds to be used in lieu of interest not collected from farmers on loans.

Sixth. Forty million bushels of wheat held by the Farm Board were processed into flour and distributed to the needy through the Red Cross. We must not hesitate to feed the hungry and relieve the distressed if the full amount of wheat held by the Farm Board is required.

Seventh. More comprehensive measures urged by the various farm organizations are pending in both the House and Senate to assist the agricultural classes and should be enacted before Congress adjourns.

THE REVENUE BILL

The Government expenditures for the last fiscal year were reported approximately $903,000,000 in excess of the revenues. Congress was urged to balance the Budget. In other words, to provide additional revenues sufficient to meet the expenditures. With the most rigid economy, and after reducing the expenditures to the bare necessities, it was estimated that at least $1,241,000,000 additional revenue would be required. The revenue bill, when reported, provided for increased income taxes, higher estate taxes, savings through administration, a general sales tax, and many other provisions.

I made a speech outlining my views in detail on the subject of taxation, urging the most rigid economy by reducing Government expenditures 25 per cent, supported the administrative changes, advocated higher income taxes in the upper brackets, voted for the estate taxes, for taxes on stock transfers, but opposed the general sales tax as an excessive burden upon the consuming masses already too heavily burdened, and opposed the increase in letter postage from 2 cents to 3 cents because this class of mail is carried at a profit to the Government now. I have followed the principle that the tax burdens of the country should be borne by those citizens or corporations in proportion to the benefits received and their ability to pay. The speech which I made was printed at my own expense and distributed to inform my constituents of my position in greater detail.

ECONOMY IN PUBLIC EXPENDITURES

Rigid economy in all public expenditures—local, State, and Federal—is one of the most important subjects before the people at this time. The major part of our taxes is local. Comparatively few people pay any direct Federal taxes, but everyone pays a tariff tax. To reduce expenditures to a minimum is the surest way to reduce taxes. I have consistently voted against all unnecessary tax burdens and for all tax reductions.

As a member of the Committee on Appropriations of the House I have voted for every amendment to reduce appropriations below the estimates of the Bureau of the Budget, have voted for no increases, and have not voted for any new items.

The appropriations as they passed the House reduced the estimates of the Bureau of the Budget by $161,000,000 and the appropriations for the coming fiscal year as they passed the House are $562,000,000 under those for 1932.

M'DUFFIE ECONOMY PLAN

When the McDuffie economy amendment was proposed to the legislative appropriation bill I voted for the Bacon amendment to reduce salaries of Members of Congress from $10,000 to $7,500 per year; when that failed I voted for the Hardy amendment to reduce these salaries to $9,000; and when that failed I voted for a straight cut of 11 per cent on salaries of all Government employees, with an exemption of a minimum of $1,000, and this applied to salaries of Members of Congress. When that failed I voted for all other amendments which provided for the greatest decrease in salaries. In the present emergency I thought all employees should be willing to make some financial sacrifices.

I also voted to consolidate the Army and the Navy under one head, which it was estimated would save from fifty to seventy-five million dollars.

My record shows that I voted for various other proposed consolidations and eliminations of bureaus which would effect economy.

APPROPRIATIONS

During the first 15 months of Washington's administration the total expenditures of our Government amounted to $4,269,027. The expenditures for the present fiscal year made by the last Congress, including the Postal Service, will aggregate the staggering total of approximately $5,178,524,967.95. We spend more than one thousand two hundred times now for the expenses of the Government, in one year, than was spent during the administration of Washington.

The reduced appropriations by the present Congress for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, as they passed the House, are as follows:

For the Interior Department	$50,446,432.33
Treasury and Post Office Departments	1,059,778,163.00
Navy Department	326,353,459.00
Agricultural Department	175,408,814.00
First deficiency	125,159,042.75
War Department	392,586,146.00
Independent offices	985,931,431.00
State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor	124,215,992.33
District of Columbia	39,913,810.00
Legislative establishment	20,223,869.00
Second deficiency	15,398,873.01

In addition to the direct appropriations, other expenditures have been authorized in large sums for which Congress is obligated to make future appropriations.

To the amount of the above appropriations should be added $1,285,742,728, estimated amount of permanent and indefinite appropriations for interest on the public debt, sinking-fund requirements, and other miscellaneous and fixed purposes for which annual appropriations are not required or necessary.

BUREAU OF THE BUDGET

The Bureau of the Budget is the President's agency to study every item of expenditure requested by the head of a department, bureau, or independent commission. Congress appropriated for the current year $191,000 for the expenses of this bureau. The bureau has 35 employees. In addition, there may be detailed to it the services of 26 assistants from the Army and Navy Departments. The estimates prepared by the Bureau of the Budget are forwarded to Congress by and with the approval of the President of the United States. They are thus his estimates.

During the present year, let me repeat, the appropriation bills as they passed the House have been reduced by $161,000,000 under the estimates of the Bureau of the Budget, and the appropriations are $562,000,000 under the appropriations for the previous fiscal year.

FOREIGN DEBT SETTLEMENTS

During the World War Congress authorized loans to foreign governments in large sums and pledged our people that these amounts so loaned would be collected in full.

I voted against all settlements with foreign governments which canceled or remitted any part of them, principal or interest. I made an extended speech against the Italian debt settlement, which, calculated upon a 4¼ per cent interest basis, the amount we pay on our Liberty bonds, canceled $3,413,874,500, and I also made a speech against and vigorously protested the French debt settlement, based upon a 4¼ per cent interest basis, lost to us, or canceled, or remitted $4,527,225,895.83.

On the settlement with the 13 foreign governments, calculated upon a 4¼ per cent interest basis, according to figures prepared by the Treasury Department, we lost $10,705,618,006.90.

MORATORIUM RESOLUTION

I voted against the moratorium resolution in December, 1931, which extended the interest on these debts, amounting to $252,566,803. Instead of this interest being extended for one year by the moratorium resolution, it is postponed to be repaid over a period of 10 years, beginning July 1, 1933.

TARIFF REVISION

All economists agree that one of the causes of the depression is the 1930 tariff act. In a large measure it destroyed our market for foreign products. It caused many foreign governments to enact discriminatory tariff legislation against us.

The tariff will not enable the farmer to secure more for those farm products of which we regularly raise an exportable surplus.

In 1930 we produced 13,932,000,000 bales of cotton and the imports of long-staple cotton were negligible; we produced 898,011,000 bushels of wheat and imported wheat and wheat products amounting to 21,000 bushels; we produced 2,060,185,000 bushels of corn and imported 1,554,971 bushels.

We regularly export wheat, corn, and cotton, our three major crops, and are therefore dependent upon a foreign market. Our imports of these three products are negligible.

To illustrate, in 1930 we imported one forty-fifth of 1 per cent of the wheat we produced; we imported a small quantity of long-staple or sea-island cotton, used principally in automobile manufacture, not a pound of which is grown in Oklahoma; we imported only about one-thirteenth of 1 per cent as much corn as we produced. The tariff bill placed a duty of 42 cents per bushel on wheat and 25 cents per bushel on corn. If we shut out entirely all imports of these three products it would not enhance their value to the producers.

We tried to make this duty effective through the debenture plan, which would have insured the producers 50 per cent of the tariff duty on their products, and where there is no duty on a product, such as cotton, the debenture plan provided 2 cents per pound.

The debenture plan was vetoed by the President. It is the only way to make the tariff effective as to those farm products of which we regularly raise a surplus and ship and sell to foreign markets.

Congress tried to assist the farmers in marketing their crops through the equalization fee, but this was defeated by threat of veto.

On the other hand, the tariff bill raises the duty on practically every commodity the consumer must buy, including clothing, boots and shoes, sugar, cement, lumber, steel products, rayon goods, and, in fact, on everything which the farmer must purchase. You can not make the farmer more prosperous by taxing him more. He has literally been bled white by the industrialists of the East. For this reason banks in farming communities have failed, business concerns have gone into bankruptcy, farm lands have been sold for taxes, mortgages have been foreclosed, all resulting in a general business depression.

I voted against the tariff bill, which can be of no possible benefit to the farmers of Oklahoma.

MUSCLE SHOALS

The Government has an investment of approximately $140,000,000 at Muscle Shoals. I have advocated the continued utilization of this plant primarily for the production of the ingredients of fertilizer in times of peace and for the manufacture of munitions in times of national emergency, and resisted the turning of this plant over to the power monopoly. Whether this plant is leased or operated by the Government, the sale of the power should be safeguarded so that it may not be monopolized by the Power Trust.

Congress passed a bill during the present session providing for the lease of the plant, and for its operation in event a satisfactory lease can not be made.

RURAL CREDITS

I was a member of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House in 1916 and assisted in the preparation and passage of the rural credits bill on July 17, 1916. This was a great piece of constructive legislation. It enables the farmers to borrow money through the Federal land banks with which to pay off existing mortgages, purchase livestock, and for other purposes; and this money is borrowed on long-time loans, repayable on the amortization plan at low rates of interest.

I have introduced in the House a bill to authorize the appointment of local agents to represent farm-land banks in initiating and supervising loans to farmers, which should greatly popularize this law and expedite the making of loans to the farmers without the necessity of organizing local loan associations. With this amendment adopted, I regard this bill as one of the most constructive measures in aid of the farmers that Congress has ever enacted.

SURETY BONDS TO PROTECT INDIVIDUAL BANK DEPOSITS

Since coming to Congress I have advocated the passage of legislation providing for the protection of individual bank deposits in all banks which are members of the Federal reserve system. Congress does not have jurisdiction over other banks. I introduced and have made a number of speeches in the House in favor of a bill to require all banks, National and State, members of the Federal reserve system, to furnish bonds for the protection of their general deposits.

The House has passed H. R. 11362, reported from the Banking and Currency Committee, which, while not making each individual bank guarantee its own deposits, does provide for the creation of a fund sufficiently large, which will be a protection to the general depositors. The depositors of all banks, State and National, are alike protected to the extent of the fund. This is a forward step in the interest of the depositor.

If it is necessary or desirable to require banks to protect Federal deposits and State, city, school, and Indian deposits, why, on principle, should not protection be required for the benefit of the individual depositors?

ROAD LEGISLATION

The enactment of the act of July 11, 1916, authorizing Federal cooperation in the building of roads, has greatly added to the enthusiasm for building roads throughout the country. I made a speech in favor of it and have supported all subsequent appropriations for Federal aid to roads.

Oklahoma was admitted to statehood November 16, 1907. The eastern half was composed of lands formerly occupied by the Five Civilized Tribes of Indians. The land had only recently been surveyed and allotted to the Indians. The roads had not been improved, but since then we have had a revolution in road building.

I have supported all subsequent appropriations to enable the Federal Government to continue to contribute to road building throughout the Nation.

RURAL MAIL SERVICE

The farmers are rendered no more important service than that given by the rural delivery of mails. This service was started in an experimental way in 1896. It has been extended to the most remote parts of the country, until on June 30, 1931, there were 42,412 rural routes in operation in the United States, 1,172 such routes in operation in the State of Oklahoma, and 92 in the second congressional district.

I have taken an active interest in postal matters. Appropriations have been increased from year to year, greatly expanding the service. As roads are improved and all streams bridged, I hope to see rural routes gridiron the second district and the Nation, so as to afford complete mail facilities to every rural community. The appropriations for this service during my service in Congress have increased from $53,000,000 to $106,000,000 annually. I have been instrumental in securing the installation of village delivery in the small towns of the second congressional district.

SOLDIER LEGISLATION

During my entire service in Congress, both during the World War and since the war, I have voted for all legislation recommended for the benefit of our soldiers of all wars.

We passed the Spanish-American War pension bill, placing the veterans of that war upon an equality with the veterans of other wars, greatly liberalizing the legislation and equalizing the pensions. Pensions for the survivors of the Civil War and their widows were increased, the minimum pensions for survivors being increased to $75 and where they are so disabled as to require an attendant, $100 per month.

Widows of Civil War soldiers receive $40 per month, and if married to the soldier during the war they receive $50 per month.

Congress has from time to time enacted additional legislation making provision for increased hospitalization facilities, extended the time for conversion of insurance, and for vocational training.

PAYMENT OF ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

I have earnestly supported legislation for the payment of the balance due in cash upon the adjusted-compensation certificates, both because this payment would be of great benefit to the ex-service men themselves and because, in my judgment, such payment would do more to relieve the depression than any other legislation Congress could enact. Such a payment would increase the currency in circulation in this country and aid every home and every community throughout the Nation; it would relieve the unemployment situation, increase the purchasing power of the dollar, and assist every business, great and small.

I earnestly supported the Patman bill providing for payment of these certificates in cash; but as an alternative measure, in event of unfavorable action on the Patman bill, I introduced a bill providing for payment of these certificates by exchange for 4½ per cent tax-exempt Government bonds, which would result in the ex-service men securing the balance due on their certificates. The quotations in the daily papers show 4¼ per cent bonds above par and not under, as has been misrepresented.

IMMIGRATION

In the consideration of the immigration bill eight years ago I earnestly supported the bill and made a speech in favor of its enactment. The number of immigrants to be admitted to this country has been reduced to approximately 150,000 annually. I voted for the Burnett immigration bill in 1917. In 1907 about 1,285,349 immigrants were admitted to this country. No person should be admitted who is not desirous or capable of becoming a patriotic citizen, obedient to the laws of our country and loyal to our flag.

During my service in Congress I have supported amendments designed and recommended to strengthen the immigration laws and to expedite the deportation of those undesirable aliens guilty of violations of the law amounting to a felony.

In a preceding Congress provision has been made giving preference of admission in the quota class of near relatives of American citizens, including husband and wife and father and mother.

INDORSED BY LABOR

My consistent record in sympathy with labor has won the hearty indorsement of the legislative representatives of the various labor organizations.

OLD-AGE PENSIONS

A number of bills have been introduced and one has been favorably reported to the House to protect labor in old age. I favor such legislation, both State and Federal.

HOSPITAL AT MUSKOGEE

The United States Veterans' Hospital No. 90, at Muskogee was purchased from the State of Oklahoma and later the municipal hospital was purchased from the city of Muskogee. I actively assisted in securing appropriations for these purchases. This hospital is ideally located, is adequate, and well equipped to care for the needs of the ex-service men and others eligible to admission from the area which it serves.

This splendid institution admirably serves the veterans of all wars eligible to hospitalization, and in addition is of great benefit to the city of Muskogee and surrounding territory. The Government spends $590,000 per annum upon its maintenance.

DIVISION OF FEDERAL COURT

In the division of the Federal court districts in Oklahoma we were successful in having a favorable division made of the business and area. The eastern district of Oklahoma embraces 31 counties.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT OKMULGEE

The public building for the city of Okmulgee is now under construction and the amount necessary for its completion has been authorized.

An amendment which I offered in the House to a pending court bill, and which was approved February 16, 1925, designated Okmulgee as a place for holding Federal court. The location of the Federal court there justified a much larger public building in that city for the purpose of housing the various governmental activities, including the Federal court and post office, and the appropriation was increased to $330,000 for this building.

THE OIL INDUSTRY

The oil industry is one of the most important in the Nation, and particularly so to the State of Oklahoma. The income derived from oil and gas has materially helped in the development of the State, built cities and towns, improved farms, made it possible to build better schools and churches, and through a gross production tax paid to the State, has contributed largely to a fund for the carrying on of every branch of our State government. From the gasoline tax roads and bridges are in large measure built and maintained. The individual farmer is interested in having his land prospected for oil and gas, and the public is interested in the development of the oil fields throughout the State, because of the revenues received which measurably reduce the tax burdens of the people.

The oil industry has been greatly depressed through the importation by four large companies of immense quantities of oil from foreign countries, rendering ineffective curtailment plans of our domestic producers. To protect the oil industry against these large importations I favor a tariff on oil. Every argument that can be made for a tariff on any other product can with equal, if not greater, force be made for a tariff on oil.

When we were unable to get a tariff on oil I urged an excise tax on all oil and its derivatives imported into this country, and we assisted in securing the insertion of a provision in the revenue bill placing an excise tax of 1 cent per gallon or 42 cents per barrel on oil and its derivatives imported into this country.

Every citizen of my State is intensely interested in this question because of the revenue derived from this source by the State of Oklahoma. In 1927 this revenue amounted to $11,476,851.40, but was reduced to only $4,332,123.60 in 1931.

THE ARKANSAS RIVER AND FLOOD CONTROL

The Arkansas River flows through the eastern part of Oklahoma, and its tributaries—the Illinois, Grand, Verdigris, Cimarron, Canadian, and Deep Fork Rivers and others—drain practically every county in the State.

The control of our inland waterways is of tremendous importance to the entire Nation and is of particular importance to Oklahoma.

Congress enacted comprehensive flood-control legislation and has provided for a survey of the Mississippi River and all of its tributaries, including the Arkansas River and its major tributaries. Of the amount appropriated for this purpose, $5,000,000 was authorized for use in making a survey of the tributaries of the Mississippi River, including the Arkansas and its tributaries. However, the report of this survey has not yet been completed by the War Department. It is expected that this report will justify a sufficient expenditure upon this river as to restore navigation and reduce freight rates, which will invite the location of factories and greatly add to the prosperity of the people of the Arkansas Valley and its contiguous territory.

We have been urging the reservoir plan of flood control, which, if adopted, would result in impounding the water in reservoirs at strategic points, to be gradually released for water power, irrigation, and navigation purposes. This would check the ravages of disastrous floods, save millions of dollars' worth of property from destruction, and make certain the cultivation of large areas of productive land.

INDIAN LEGISLATION

Congress has enacted much legislation affecting the Indians in Oklahoma. In all there are 33 Indian tribes in Oklahoma. No additional legislation is necessary to wind up the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes unless it be appropriations to cover judgments, if any are secured against the Government in the suits which have been filed, and the closing up of the affairs of these tribes is now a question of administration.

The Five Civilized Tribes had 101,506 allottees. The number of living restricted allottees is estimated to approximate 10,000. The restrictions upon all others have been removed either by law, by the Secretary of the Interior, or by death.

a. Appropriations for the Indian Service

The appropriations for the Indian Service are carried in the Interior Department appropriation bill. Approximately $2,500,000 is expended annually in Oklahoma out of Federal funds for all appropriations for administering the Indian schools and hospitals, including $240,000 for the office of the superintendent for the Five Civilized Tribes at Muskogee, Okla.; $400,000 in aid of the common schools of eastern Oklahoma; for the Sequoyah Orphan Training School, $238,625; for the Euchee Boarding School at Sapulpa, $46,775; for the Eufaula Indian Boarding School, $68,125; for the Carter Seminary (Bloomfield Academy), $68,100; for the Chilocco Indian Boarding School, $382,000; for Wheelock Academy, $82,050; for Jones Academy, $68,125; for Haskell Institute at Lawrence, Kans., $396,000, 40 per cent of the attendance at which school is by children of the Five Civilized Tribes, $148,400.

In addition various amounts are expended on lump sums for Indian boarding schools, among the several Indian tribes in western Oklahoma. For preservation of health there is expended for various hospitals, including the hospitals at Claremore and Talihina, and numerous others, $353,000; there is expended out of the Osage funds $150,000 in support of the Osage Agency.

The total amount expended for schools, health work, and administrative purposes, but not including those for per capita payments for the Indian tribes in the western part of Oklahoma, aggregates the sum of $2,500,000.

b. Jurisdictional bills

I prepared and reported the jurisdictional bills for the Cherokees and Creeks and assisted in securing the enactment of jurisdictional bills for the other five tribes in 1924 authorizing each tribe to bring suit in the Court of Claims, with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States by either party, on all claims that each tribe may have against the Government. Under these several jurisdictional bills the Cherokees have prepared and filed 9 suits, the Creeks 14 suits, the Seminoles 9 suits, and the Chickasaws and Choctaws 9 suits. In a number of these suits two or more causes of action have been joined. The final date for filing all suits under these several jurisdictional acts, as amended, expired June 30, 1930.

Demurrers have been argued in some of the cases settling the legal questions, and all of them are to be tried during the next fiscal year. If any amount is found due in any suit against the Government Congress will be asked to make appropriations to cover the same.

c. Choctaw and Chickasaw per capita payments authorized

By an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill approved February 14, 1920, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make per capita payments to the Choctaws and Chickasaws out of any tribal funds available for that purpose. No further legislation is necessary by Congress.

d. Status of the Five Civilized Tribes

With the exception of the suits which have been filed and are pending in the Court of Claims the affairs of the Cherokee Tribe have been completely wound up. The same is true as to the Creeks, except as to the school property at Sapulpa and Eufaula, as to the Seminoles except the boarding school at Wewoka, and as to the Choctaws and Chickasaws, except the boarding school at Carter Seminary, Wheelock and Jones Academies, and the coal and asphalt deposits for which Congress enacted additional legislation authorizing reappraisement and sale, and an adjustment of the "leased district," which is pending in the Court of Claims for findings of fact and report.

AVIATION AND RADIO

I have supported all legislation and appropriations to stimulate aviation and the development of the radio.

As the motor car in a large measure succeeded the slower methods of transportation, aviation is destined to expand into universal use: For all kinds of commercial uses, for carrying the mails and express, lighter freight, passenger transportation, and by the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps for military purposes.

The radio is capable of unlimited development. No one will hazard a guess as to its immediate possibilities. It is revolutionizing communication. I have given whole-hearted support to the development of both aviation and the radio. Both should continue to receive the assistance of Congress through helpful legislation.

There must be the greatest vigilance in the enactment of legislation and in the administration of it to protect the public in the use of the radio and against monopoly and unfair discrimination in granting licenses for broadcasting stations.

SPEECHES

For a Member of Congress to keep up with all of the bills introduced is almost a physical impossibility. He of course is expected to be familiar with those reported from the committees of which he is a member, and every Member attempts to familiarize himself with bills of general importance to the entire country and especially with those which particularly affect his district and State.

I promised my constituents that I would do this, and I have consistently tried to keep that pledge.

In addition to participating in general debate upon a large number of matters, I have made a study of and speeches in the House on the following subjects:

First. Speech reviewing the Interior Department appropriation bill, which makes appropriations for the Indian Service, including the office of Superintendent for the Five Civilized Tribes at Muskogee, health work, boarding schools, and $400,000 annually in aid of the common schools in eastern Oklahoma.

Second. Speech in favor of the Norris ("lame-duck") constitutional amendment changing the time for the inauguration of the President and the convening of Congress soon after the general election in November to carry into effect the mandate of the people.

Third. Three speeches, one before the House Ways and Means Committee and two in the House, favoring the Patman bill for the payment in cash of the balance due the ex-service men on their adjusted-compensation certificates.

Fourth. Speech favoring the leasing of the Muscle Shoals plant and urging that it should be utilized primarily for the manufacture of fertilizer ingredients.

Fifth. Speech before the Banking and Currency Committee of the House in support of a bill to provide a fund for the protection of general depositors of failed banks.

Sixth. Three speeches, one before the House Ways and Means Committee and two in the House, urging an excise tax on imported oil and on imported gasoline for the protection of our domestic producers.

Seventh. Speech on the revenue bill, urging an increased rate on incomes in the higher brackets, larger estate taxes, greater economy in government, reduction of expenditures by 25 per cent, and opposing the sales tax.

Eighth. Speech explaining provisions of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill, its purposes, its aid in stabilizing conditions in the country, and showing that $63,342,103 of the amount appropriated has been loaned to the farmers.

Ninth. Speech opposing the moratorium resolution extending the date of payment of interest by the foreign governments indebted to us, amounting to $252,566,803, over a period of 10 years.

Tenth. Speech opposing increase in first-class postage rates on letters from 2 to 3 cents.

Eleventh. Speech in favor of appropriations for good roads, for aid of unemployment, and as an investment looking to the development of every section of our country.

Either during this session or in previous sessions of Congress I have discussed practically every subject of special interest to my district and State and of general interest to the Nation as a whole, and among them the following:

First. Speech analyzing and discussing in detail: (a) The farm bill on April 20, 1929; and (b) conference report on the farm bill June 3, 1930, in which I analyzed and discussed in detail the farm bill approved June 15, 1929.

Second. The tariff bill: (a) Speech of May 21, 1929, analyzing and explaining the tariff bill as not being beneficial to the farmers and consumers; (b) speech of April 25, 1930, (1) further analyzing in detail the objections to the tariff bill showing additional burdens to the farmers without any compensating benefits, (2) explaining the debenture as the only way to make the tariff effective as to agriculture, and (3) criticizing the power given to the President by the flexible provision of the tariff.

Third. Flood control—two speeches: (a) January 24, 1930, and April 25, 1930, emphasizing the necessity for flood control, (b) urging legislation for the Arkansas River and its tributaries, (c) inviting attention to the reservoir plan, (d) calling attention to advantages of navigation and the lowering of freight rates, and (e) inserting a report from the War Department showing the status of the surveys now being made of the Arkansas River and major tributaries.

Fourth. Tax-reduction legislation: (a) Views outlined on principles of taxation and (b) urging increased exemptions upon the small income-tax payers and advocating the collection of a larger percentage from those in the higher brackets having the ability to pay.

Fifth. Constitutional amendment: (a) Speech urging, in the interest of economy, a constitutional amendment authorizing the President to veto separate items in appropriation bills; and (b) citing letters from governors of many States indorsing the proposed amendment.

Sixth. Post office appropriation bill: A speech in support of the air mail and the rural mail service and emphasizing their importance.

Seventh. Interior Department appropriation bill: (a) Items affecting the Indian Service, schools, and health in Oklahoma, (b) insisting on expedition in winding up the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes, (c) report of present status of affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes, including suits instituted and tribal property held.

Eighth. Speech on February 1, 1930, to enlarge the definition of oleomargarine and the protection of the dairy industry.

Ninth. Speech in support of amendment to rural credits bill providing for appointment of local agents for farm-land banks.

Tenth. Speech in support of an increase of pensions for Spanish-American War veterans, and bill to increase pensions of soldiers and widows of soldiers of the Civil War.

Eleventh. Speech in support of bill to liberalize legislation in aid of the ex-service men of the World War.

DEPARTMENTAL WORK AND CORRESPONDENCE

We feel justified in inviting attention to our familiarity with departmental work and have made an effort to give diligent attention to all such matters. Our rule is to answer every letter and telegram the day it is received unless delay is occasioned in getting information from or action by the departments. There are many requests and inquiries with reference to the approval and assignment of oil and gas leases forwarded to the department here, the removal of restrictions on Indian lands, letters from ex-service men with reference to applications for compensation and hospitalization, applications for pensions and increases of pensions for soldiers of all wars, petitions for the establishment of rural mail routes and changes in existing routes, and letters, petitions, and telegrams with reference to innumerable bills pending in Congress, some favoring legislation and others protesting against it.

NUMBER OF BILLS INTRODUCED

In order that my constituents may know something of the number of bills pending in Congress with which a Member must keep in touch, and with which he must familiarize himself, there were introduced in the Senate during this session of the present Congress, 4,783 bills, and in the House of Representatives 12,386 bills. In addition to these bills a large number of resolutions were introduced.

These bills and resolutions are referred to appropriate committees, and by the committees referred to the various departments affected for report. Later they are returned to the committees for consideration and report and a great many of them placed upon the calendars of the House. Each Member must make some examination and study of them, and of the hearings and reports on the more important bills. Inquiries are made of us, however, on many bills which are introduced which have not been reported upon by the committees.

COMMITTEE ASSIGNMENTS—APPROPRIATIONS

Since coming to Congress I have had the experience of service on the following committees of the House:

Banking and Currency, Indian Affairs, Accounts, chairman of Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, and Education.

I am now promoted to a place on the Committee on Appropriations, which prepares and recommends all of the appropriations for the Federal Government. Many regard this as the leading committee of Congress.

I have been assigned to membership on two subcommittees of the Committee on Appropriations: (1) The Interior Department appropriation bill, which carries all the appropriations for the activities of that department, including public lands, the Indian Service, irrigation and reclamation, national parks, education, the Geological Survey, and other miscellaneous items expended under the supervision of the Interior Department.

This bill makes appropriations for the office of the Superintendent for the Five Civilized Tribes at Muskogee, Okla., health work among the Indians, appropriations for 12 boarding schools in Oklahoma, and $400,000 annually in aid of the common schools in eastern Oklahoma.

(2) Independent offices appropriation bill, which makes appropriations for all bureaus and commissions not supervised by a Cabinet officer, 33 in all, including the Veterans' Administration, which supervises and expends appropriations for pensions, hospitals, disability compensation, and, in fact, all expenditures for the veterans of all wars, including the ex-service men of the World War.

CONCLUSION

(1) The individual record of each candidate should be studied and (2) the right of franchise exercised by every eligible voter.

I invite attention to, and make this record of, some of my activities during my service in Congress, peculiarly affecting the people of my district as well as the Nation as a whole, for two reasons: First, because the people who commissioned me to represent them are entitled to know what their Representative has accomplished and his position on all public questions; and, second, in order to afford no opportunity for anyone to misstate my position on public questions.

I submit this record to the people of my district for their information and consideration with the confident hope that it will meet with their approval.

Let me emphasize that every citizen of the Nation should carefully study the individual record of each Member of Congress in order to form a correct opinion as to his knowledge of conditions, his sympathy with the needs of the people, his ability, experience, and fitness to represent them, and should not fail or hesitate to exercise the right of franchise both in the primary and general election. When every citizen—not 51 per cent of them—goes to the polls and votes for his best interests and those of his children, and not his prejudices, his views will be reflected in Congress.

GUARANTY FUND FOR BANK DEPOSITS

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members of the House may have five legislative days within which to extend their own remarks on the bill that has just been passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mrs. PRATT. Mr. Speaker, no one—certainly not one who holds a position as Representative of a portion of the population in the National Legislature—can feel other than the utmost sympathy for the basic desire back of a bill which is to assure to bank depositors the ability to withdraw their deposits in whole or in part when desired or needed, with the certainty that there will be no loss of any portion, however small, whether because of failure of the bank or for any other reason.

If there is anything on which we can all agree, it is the need of greater safety to depositors who may be the innocent victims of failures for which they are in no way responsible. Their relationship to the banks in which they have deposited their money is not that of creditors in ordinary commercial dealings. There is no hope or expectation of profit in most deposits, which are made usually with a desire for a certain form of service generally paid for by the willingness to forego the receipt of any interest or the acceptance of a rate far below the prevailing rate. The bank in performing this service really acts as trustee for the depositors' funds, and the fact of trusteeship should require in this instance, as in all other similar relationships, the absolute safety of the trust in so far as is humanly possible.

I am opposed to the Steagall bill because I do not believe that the purpose can thus be achieved. Rather am I of the opinion that the bill will result in bringing about evils that will make our situation even worse than at present.

It has repeatedly been said that one of the advantages we have in this country as a result of our governmental structure is that in the existence of our 48 sovereign States we have 48 experimental laboratories in which new ideas in government, or affecting government, or requiring governmental sanction, can be tried out under varying conditions. If successful, the ideas can be extended to the other States, and ultimately to the entire country if uniformity be desirable or necessary. We have this advantage with regard to the idea of bank depositors' guaranties. Within the past quarter of a century, no less than eight States have experimented with the idea—and with disastrous results, making ultimate repeal imperative.

It was only a year ago when the announcement came that the Texas system was ready for final winding up—four years after repeal of the law during which the resources of the fund were impounded and suffered a shrinkage of one-fourth. And only as recently as five weeks ago, according to an item in the United States Daily of May 20, the superintendent of banks of South Dakota announced the existence of a net balance estimated at about $275,000 as available for distribution to the creditors of banks suspended prior to July 1, 1927, the date of repeal.

This will go to the holders of about 100,000 certificates, which means that the depositors will get an average of $2.75 each in the final liquidation. As a verbal statement credited to the banking superintendent placed the total deficit of the system at some $36,000,000, the dividend being distributed represents about three-quarters of 1 per cent of the liability.

The above represents a fairly typical picture of what has happened in the States which tried out the plan of guaranteeing bank deposits. Hence it may be interesting to present a brief summary of the history of the idea, which seems to have arisen from the depths of despair at an earlier period in our history which, like the present, wrought havoc with our banks. It was during the panic of 1907 and, like the Steagall bill, it was designed with the hope that it would—

First. Prevent distress to individual depositors.

Second. Avert financial embarrassment to other lines of activity indirectly.

Third. Check bank runs, hence panics, by improving the faith of the general public in the banks and the banking system.

Fourth. Increase the use of banks generally by the public.

Oklahoma was the first State to introduce the guaranty system, its anxiety for statehood being apparently mixed up, in part at least, to the desire for such a measure, which was adopted December 17, 1907, one month following admission as a State. The law was mandatory and laid down the general principles followed since, except for the fact that no limit was placed on special assessments made necessary by depletion of the fund. The Kansas statute, adopted the following year, differed in many important particulars, especially in that it was optional rather than mandatory. It was temporarily enjoined in 1909, and in March of that year Nebraska adopted a guaranty plan, but the injunction was dissolved, and the operation of the guaranty was resumed in 1910. The operation of the Nebraska law was also enjoined, but it was upheld by the Supreme Court, and operations commenced in 1911.

Texas followed Nebraska on August 8 of that same year, 1909. It was nearly five years before the idea had any more converts. Mississippi was the next State, its act being dated March 9, 1914. A year later, March 13, 1915, came South Dakota, and not for another four years, on March 10, 1917, did the last two States, North Dakota and Washington, fall in line.

At first the apparent effects of these laws seemed so good as to point to ultimate success for the guaranty principle. As a matter of fact, that was due merely to the fact that general economic conditions were good. In Nebraska they were such as to be ideal for almost any experiment; but the guaranty law was believed to be responsible, and the banks used the law in their advertisements for additional business. National banks tried to take advantage of these laws, but on July 28 the United States Attorney General ruled that they had not the power, under the Oklahoma law, and in 1909 he made a similar ruling with regard to the Kansas act, in spite of the effort to get around the principles involved by limiting the liability. The result was a rush of national banks to join the State banking systems, at least this was true in Nebraska, in order to secure the benefits of the law.
